Governor declares education top priority of 'quiet crises'

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

Gov. John Carlin declared education to be a top priority among several "quiet crises" which will face the 1984 Kansas Legislature.

Carlin used his Jan. 10 State of the State Address to warn members of the Kansas Legislature of issues which have slowly eroded Kansas' economic and social interests. Carlin said the time has come to address growing problems in the areas of education, the environment, prison facilities and tax structure inequities.

Noting that children's scores on standardized achievement tests have declined yearly since the 1960s, Carlin said that "cosmetic changes are not the answer" for educational problems. Rather, "the approach we take to improving education must be comprehensive," he said.

To combat the state's educational shortcomings, Carlin offered several proposals.

First, he recommended an across-the-board salary increase of nearly 10 percent for teachers. In addition, he proposed giving another $54 million in general state aid to education.

To enhance the quality of teachers, Carlin recommended that the State Board of Education require use of the National Teacher Exam for initial certification in Kansas beginning in spring 1986.

In addition, Carlin suggested that prospective teachers be required to complete a one-year internship in a teaching position for full certification. The requirement would begin during the 1986-87 school year.

In the area of curriculum, Carlin recommended that the legislature re-establish a competency-based testing program and that the State Board of Education increase graduation requirements. Such requirements would emphasize math, science and computer science to be adopted over a three-year period.

Carlin also noted that "now is the time to increase our support" for the state university system, but did not elaborate with specific recommendations.

Turning to environmental problems, Carlin noted growing evidence that land burial of hazardous wastes results in contamination of the soil and water.

"I believe the time has come for us to prohibit land burial of hazardous waste and encourage the use of alternative forms of disposal," Carlin said.

Carlin conceded that alternative forms of burial were more expensive, but warned that "the costs of delaying action are even greater."

He also recommended the creation of a state superfund to permit the investigation of numerous waste sites currently suspected of leaking contaminants into the soil and water. He said that those identified as responsible for problems would be expected to help pay for the costs of investigating and cleaning up the sites.

Carlin warned that water depletion also poses a serious threat to Kansas' interests. He proposed two steps toward a comprehensive water plan for the state.

President Ross Doyen listen to the speech Tuesday morning. Carlin warned legislators about "quiet crises" which have been slowly harming the state.

sive water plan for the state.

First, Carlin recommended adopting standards to regulate minimum stream flows in Kansas in order to ensure appropriate levels for the future.

Then he proposed a resolution authorizing the state to begin negotiating with the federal government to purchase water storage rights in reservoirs. Currently, the state does not have the option to purchase water storage rights.

Declaring that the current state prison system jeopardizes the public's safety, Carlin said that unless the state does something to alleviate prison overcrowding, the state faces the possibility of court-ordered action taking place instead.

Carlin said that existing buildings at the Winfield State Hospital and the Topeka State Hospital could be renovated to provide additional space for minimum-security prisoners. Carlin said that immediate, decisive action could provide 300 additional beds by summer and thus solve the short-term problem.

Carlin proposed three ways to help solve the long-term prison problem. These recommendations involve completing new prison facilities, establishing new honor camps for minimum-security prisoners, and expanding community corrections programs.

Turning to economic development, Carlin said that Kansas could expect to be in fierce competition with other states in attracting and developing new business. He added that "our state's growth depends on our ability to attract new business to Kansas and to create new jobs."

Carlin said a major factor in attracting new business is a fair tax structure. Carlin attacked the present property tax structure as the most inequitable tax that Kansans pay.

"Equity within the system can be achieved only through a constitutional amendment permitting classification," Carlin said.

A constitutional amendment would require approval from Kansas voters. Carlin expressed his hope that the legislature would allow the voters to decide whether they want to classify property for taxation purposes.

In an effort to promote a new tax plan, Carlin announced the formation of the Kansas Tax Review Commission which is reviewing the current tax structure. The commission is being chaired by Lt. Governor Tom Docking.

While Carlin delivered his address, approximately six Highway Patrol troopers and Capitol Security officers combed through the House Chamber, looking for a bomb which anonymous callers said was set to go off at 11:25 a.m.

City plans may alter land usage

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

A city-designed plan which might alter many living quarters in Manhattan, mainly east of the campus, was the topic of discussion Tuesday afternoon at a Manhattan City Commission work session.

City Manager Don Harmon read a schedule of the city's study which would produce a plan by June 18. From now until that date the city will undertake a series of actions which will include a review of existing land uses, establishment of a series of maps showing land use and demographics, discussion of goals and several public meetings.

The main conflict seems to lie with city real estate agents, who could suffer a loss because of a decrease in sales and possibly property value.

Others concerned with the proposed changes are neighborhood residents who say they face increased parking problems and the possibility of losing aesthetic qualities of the neighborhood due to a growing number of duplexes and apartment buildings being built primarily to house K-State students.

A problem adding to that conflict has to do with the condition termed grandfathering.

Grandfathering refers to structures that don't meet the present zoning codes but are legal because the structures were purchased under previous zoning codes. There is yet another problem of dwellings which were considered to be grandfathered but are now found to be non-conforming to city zoning laws.

Mayor Wanda Fateley said that situation will have to be dealt with.

"Ignorance of the law is no excuse," Fateley said. "They are bound to know this type of thing when they are selling property. People are mad at the city that we are at the point we're at now. They should be mad at the people who sold it to them under those conditions."

Some residences, however, have been sold numerous times with no illegal intent — and owners now find their property is used illegally. Fateley and other commissioners said some property is designed and zoned for single family dwellings, but is converted into multiple dwellings by adding upstairs and downstairs apartments.

DeWayne Talley, a Manhattan land developer, said a residence on which he spent $140,000 to remodel and bring up to housing codes will be considered illegal because it is not grandfathered. It is individual properties such as Talley's that real estate agents say the city's study will eventually make illegal.

Fateley, however, disagreed. "People are jumping to the conclusion that they are wrong when they very well might not be," Fateley said. "I just can't accept the statement that this study will not solve a good portion of the problem."

Jerry Mills, a member of the Manhattan Board of Realtors and a representative of Regency

Reality, said his organization proposed a plan which would, among other things, grandfather all property from July 1, 1983. Since it is hard to prove how a residence is being used, Mills said this would help solve the burden of providing proof.

Commissioner Dave Fiser said he doesn't have much sympathy for events as recent as 1980. Fiser and other commissioners said their main concern is with people who purchased residences less recently and assumed them to be grandfathered.

While Mills said one of the reasons the board chose that date was to decrease the burden of providing proof of how property is used, the real estate agents could stand to lose money if it is not grandfathered.

Both Mills and Talley agreed that people wishing to sell residences which were once multiple family dwellings might not be able to do so if the units are considered illegal. They also argue that landlords who count on the income they receive from tenants will suffer financial losses.

Members of the Older Manhattan Neighborhood Association, comprised of citizens located mainly east of campus, oppose the board's plan. The association's main concern is increased parking problems and structures which might take away from the neighborhood's character.

Commissioners said part of the cause of the parking problem is that more students have cars as well as more family members. It is also becoming more difficult to define a family, commissioners said.

Diplomatic ties with U.S. heighten Vatican's status

By The Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Guided by Pope John Paul II's charismatic international appeal, the Vatican heightened its world status Tuesday by establishing full diplomatic relations with the United States.

Church officials say the Vatican will find its campaign for peace, justice and a better distribution of wealth throughout the world "significantly strengthened" with a formal diplomatic mission in Washington.

"I can see that the Vatican would welcome this type of recognition because its own world recognition is enhanced," said a high-ranking American churchman at the Vatican.

The United States is the only major power among the 107 nations that recognize the Holy See. There are no representatives from China and the Soviet Union, the world's largest Communist nations.

The new arrangement also will give the U.S. ambassador to the Vatican more access to information from senior diplomats who make up the ambassadorial corps to the tiny city-state.

The Vatican uses its diplomatic offices, among other things, to smooth the way for international aid during disasters and to try to head off armed international conflicts.

Church officials have frequently been active, for instance, in the Middle East and Latin America.

Since he became pope in 1978, John Paul has traveled more widely than any other pope. And he has spoken out on a wide range of world issues, including the arms race, human rights violations, hunger and poverty in the Third World and on religious freedom. He has offered to mediate to get arms talks between the Soviet Union and the United States going again and said he stands ready to go to Lebanon to do what he can to restore peace there.

The Vatican daily newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, said in an editorial Tuesday: "No one can fail to see the importance of today's development."

The newspaper suggested the relations would aid "the role, presence and importance of the Holy See in foreign areas," particularly in the search for "peace, the rights of man and socio-economic development of the world's people."

The Vatican has been represented in Washington by an apostolic delegate, who was not an official representative to the U.S. government.

Vatican ambassadors represent official church policy and teachings, and collect information for the pontiff, leader of more than 790 million Roman Catholics. They also make recommendations for new bishops.

U.S. Air Force helicopter crashes during drug interdiction mission

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Air Force helicopter on a drug interdiction mission crashed in the Atlantic Ocean near the Bahamas early Tuesday and five of the nine aboard are still missing, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said.

The other four were plucked from the sea by the USS Koelsch, a destroyer that happened to be in the area when the pilot's distress signals were broadcast, DEA administrator Francis M. Mullen Jr. said.

Mullen said the helicopter had broken off an unsuccessful effort to intercept a DC-3 aircraft that the agency suspected was planning an "air drop" of narcotics near the island of Bimini. He said it was raining heavily at the time of the crash.

Mullen said the helicopter was carrying a U.S. drug enforcement special agent, four U.S. Air Force personnel and four Bahamian police officers assigned to a special enforcement program called Operation Bahamas-Turks and designed to interdict shipments of marijuana and cocaine headed for south Florida from Latin America.

The operation was a joint effort by DEA's Miami office, the Bahamian government and the U.S. Air Force.

Professor studies elderly in Israel

George Peters, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work, will be conducting research examining the aging processes of the elderly in Israel during the spring semester at Haifa University in Israel.

Peters will learn how informal support systems, such as family and friends, and formal support systems, such as government programs, are effected in a country with a volatile environment. He will also study how the formal and informal support systems interact in Israel and will compare the status of the aged in Israel to the status of the aged in the United States.

Dr. Gandhi to speak in Catskeller

Gandhi's great grandson, Dr. S.K. Gandhi, a Topeka heart surgeon, has been announced as the speaker for the "Let's Talk About It" series at K-State Jan. 19. At noon in the Union Catskeller, Gandhi will address "Gandhi, India and World Peace." He is expected to discuss what young people can do to help bring about peace.

Gandhi came to the United States in 1967 after finishing medical school in Bombay, India. The "Let's Talk About It" series is sponsored by the Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee to discuss often controversial topics. The "Let's Talk About It" programs are free and the public is invited to attend.

Grant to finance rodent research

Donald Kaufman has received a $45,000 grant from the National Science Foundation for a study of small mammals on the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area. Kaufman, assistant professor of biology, will examine how fire affects rodent habitats in the tall-grass prairie. Konza Prairie is an ecological research area managed by the Division of Biology. It is one of 11 sites in the U.S. comprising a Long-Term Ecological Research Network supported by the National Science Foundation.

Students to study in Copenhagen

Four fourth-year students in architecture at K-State will be spending the spring semester studying at the University at Copenhagen. The students participating in the program this year are Shannon Criss, Theodore Demonchaux, David Esau and Frank Ringhofer. The four will be studying at the Danish school's Department of Architecture, following a tradition that began in the 1970s. They will study architectural design, Danish architecture and planning and the Danish language. The students will live with Danish families.

Faculty Senate tackles 'eroded' issue

The purchasing power of K-State faculty salaries has consistently eroded since the early 1970s.

This fact was included in a report presented by the faculty affairs subcommittee on faculty salaries and fringe benefits at the Faculty Senate meeting Tuesday.

Verlyn Richards, professor of finance and subcommittee chairman, said the report compared K-State faculty salaries to average per capita income in Kansas. Since 1970, the average income has risen 20 percent after being adjusted for inflation. Faculty salaries have decreased by 20 percent.

The report also compared faculty salaries of K-State and its peer institutions.

"We have typically ranked sixth out of the six institutions in that group," Richards said. "With the modest gains made last year, we moved to fifth out of six. In 1983, it would have required a six-percent salary increase to reach the average salary of the peer institutions. An 11-percent increase would be necessary to equal the highest."

When compared to other National Association of State University and Land Grant College institutions, K-State faculty salaries are 13 percent below the average, Richards said.

Recommendations made by the report were to fund the 2.25-percent deferred 1984 salary increase, to provide adequate 1985 funding for eliminating part of the K-State faculty deficit and to develop a plan to eliminate remaining deficits.

The report and its recommendations were approved by the senate.

Richard Gallagher, professor of electrical engineering, answered questions on the report's distribution.

"Last year the report was distributed to the Regents' (Kansas Board of Regents) office and legislators in the area," he said.

Sandra Coyner, director of women's studies, said the senate should evaluate its role in trying to increase faculty salaries.

"Political opinion is more likely to be influenced by conversation on the level of bumper stickers than of scholarly reports," she said.

"Does Faculty Senate see itself as a group generating reports or an advocacy group? If Faculty Senate wants to move in the direction of advocacy, I think that a committee should be appointed to look into this," Coyner said.

In other business, the senate approved course and curriculum changes concerning the speech and music departments.

I received a grade in a class last semester that I don't think is fair. Is there anything I can do about it?

Yes, there is an undergraduate grievance policy. The policy states there are four procedural levels to be followed.

Level I — all efforts will be made by the instructor involved and the student to settle the dispute.

Level II — if not resolved at Level I, either party may appeal in writing to the appropriate department head who will act as a mediator. A student also may request the dean of his or her college to appoint an ombudsman to act as facilitator.

Level III — if not previously resolved, a written appeal may be made to the dean of the college most directly concerned, who will act as a second mediator.

Level IV — if an adequate solution has still not been reached, either party may appeal in writing to the Undergraduate Grievance Board which will arbitrate the dispute. The board consists of three faculty members, one of whom serves as chair, and four students.

The complete Academic Grievance policy may be found in the student handbook, "Inside KSU". The handbook can be obtained from the Student Government Services office on the ground floor of the Union.

Could you tell me more about the Lady 'Cats basketball team? What are they currently ranked? Is it the highest they have ever been ranked?

According to Sports Information, the Lady 'Cats are currently ranked 10th by the Associated Press sports writers. This ranking, however, was established last week prior to K-State's 92-64 loss to Old Dominion.

The women's team was ranked 4th earlier this season, which is the highest they have ever been ranked. The highest ranking last season was 6th.

Statehouse bomb hoax spurs tighter security

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Three telephoned bomb threats not only caused Capitol security officers some anxious moments during Gov. John Carlin's State of the State address Tuesday, but also led to a quick tightening of security measures in the House of Representatives' chamber.

Carlin completed his 20-minute speech to a joint session in the House chamber without interruption and without knowing about the bomb scare, which proved to be a hoax. A security sweep of the House turned up nothing.

Callers to the speaker's office, House clerk's office and the State Library, all located on the third floor of the statehouse, warned a bomb would go off about 20 minutes into Carlin's speech.

House leaders and Capitol security met three hours later and decided to take additional steps to limit access to the House floor when the lower legislative chamber is not in session.

Majority Leader Joe Hoagland, an Overland Park Republican, said a step already taken to require representatives of the governor's office, the secretary of state's office and the news media to wear photo-identification badges to gain access to the House floor and to station doorkeepers at every door leading to the chamber is regarded as sufficient security precaution during House sessions.

However, he said there is concern that unauthorized persons could gain entry to the House floor when the body is not in session and leave a package containing a bomb.

"It's when we're not in session that there is a problem," Hoagland told a meeting of House leaders, doorkeepers and Capitol security personnel.

"Right now, anybody can walk in here and lay something down," said Highway Patrol Lt. Bern Prostler.

The decision was to lock all but two doors to the House chamber — one at the front and one at the rear — when the House is not in session so a reduced crew of doorkeepers can more easily watch who comes and goes and require identification of everyone.

No similar orders had been issued by late Tuesday to Senate doorkeepers to tighten security in the upper chamber.

"This is something of a national situation," Hoagland said of the concern for security. "There have been problems in other states. Historically, we've been very relaxed."

Hoagland and Prostler instructed the doorkeepers to require people to wear their identification badges at all times when they come into the House chamber.

"I think after what happened today they're going to realize why we've taken these steps," said Prostler.

The Patrol officer cautioned the doorkeepers to be especially vigilant in the next few days, because of the publicity Tuesday's bomb threats will receive.

House Speaker Mike Hayden, R-Atwood, said his was told of the threats just minutes after Carlin took the podium and began his address to the 165 legislators assembled in the chamber. Hayden said he did not evacuate the building because the threat could not be substantiated.

"Security was combing the building and we could not substantiate the threats," Hayden said after the speech.

"We followed the proper course necessary. We feel we took the proper steps. We were unable to confirm the threat."

About a half dozen Patrol troopers and Capitol Security officers walked through the House chamber looking into nooks and crannies as Carlin spoke.

Prostler said the callers warned a bomb would go off within 20 minutes of the calls, or about 11:25 a.m. The time came and passed without incident.

Carlin completed his speech and rather than walk up the center aisle and exit through the front doors of the chamber, he slipped out a set of back stairs followed closely by his Highway Patrol body guard.

Hayden then asked visitors to the House chamber to "expedite your exit."

Carlin said he had no knowledge of the bomb threats while he was speaking.

Druse leader denies Lebanon agreement

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse leader Walid Jumblatt said Tuesday that key issues remained unresolved in the plan to separate the country's warring factions and that no agreement could be expected soon.

Jumblatt's comments came only hours after sources close to the government said the issues were being resolved and the Saudi-mediated security plan was ready to be implemented.

Tuesday evening, two rocket-propelled grenades were fired at the French Embassy in Beirut from a nearby building, state radio said. No casualties were reported, and it could not immediately be determined if the building was damaged.

French troops and Lebanese army soldiers sealed off the area and searched for the attackers, who struck shortly after the city's 8 p.m. curfew went into effect.

At about the same time, positions manned by Lebanese army and French soldiers about a half-mile east of the embassy also were hit by rocket-propelled grenade and small arms fire. State radio said no casualties were reported.

A French soldier was killed and two were injured Monday when the headquarters of the French contingent of the multinational force was attacked with grenades and small arms fire about a mile to the southeast.

Jumblatt, the Syrian-backed Druse leader, told a reporter in Damascus that he was "far from expecting" any announcement of the Saudi-mediated disengagement within the next few days.

"This is because we have not reached an agreement about a number of points that are essential," he said.

Jumblatt said the unresolved points included reinstatement and promotion of Druse who left the army during civil warfare in September, the disengagement of forces in areas south of Beirut where the Druse have strongholds, and the need for neutral observers to be stationed between the factions.

Government officials or sources have said the issues were settled either in meetings with Jumblatt or at a meeting of Syrian, Lebanese and Saudi Arabian foreign ministers in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, during the past two days.

It was the latest in a series of statements by Jumblatt contradicting predictions of the plan's impending approval. One source close to the government of President Amin Gemeyal said before Jumblatt's latest statement that an announcement of the plan could come as early as Wednesday.

Illegal phone card users reach out, touch Iran

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

Mike Goldschmidt, junior in pre-design professions, was a little surprised when he returned to Manhattan two weeks ago to find his telephone had been disconnected.

In his mailbox he found a letter from the telephone company along with a bill for nearly $900.

Of the $875.63 worth of calls listed on Goldschmidt's bill, only about $100 of them were calls he had actually made. The rest were calls to Iran, charged to his Southwestern Bell Calling Card, a telephone credit card.

"There were sometimes four or five calls a night to Iran. Why would I call Iran four or five times a night, unless I were going to defect or something?" he said.

Goldschmidt is not the only person in Manhattan to get a surprise in his bill. There has been at least one person before him. Dave Vogel, regional head of Southwestern Bell Security, said he suspects two other persons in Manhattan have found an extra few hundred dollars' worth of calls on their bills recently.

Phone fraud is nothing new, but it's nothing minor. The telephone companies pay the bills in cases like these, and they add up.

Statistics indicate that American Telephone & Telegraph, the country's largest telephone company, lost over $100 million in 1982 due to fraud. Southwestern Bell, this region's division of AT&T before the Jan. 1 breakup, had almost $5 million in fraud loss that year. These costs are passed on to the consumer in terms of higher rates.

Goldschmidt became part of the 1983 statistics because he was unlucky enough to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

On Dec. 9, another student had his Calling Card number changed because someone had been using it to make fraudulent long-distance calls, Vogel said. The mystery caller or callers needed a new number in order to continue charging calls.

On that day Goldschmidt made his first and only Calling Card call from a pay phone on the ground floor of the Union.

Vogel explained what he believes probably happened next.

"In the Union there's a whole row of phones. So, you're on the phone and somebody is standing next to you, pretending he's on the phone. You're not watching what he's doing. You're watching what you're doing so you won't get that obnoxious recording telling you to 'please dial it again,'" he said.

Meanwhile, the person nearby is watching as the Calling Card number is punched in.

"All he has to do is memorize that number, and it's gone," Vogel said.

The first calls to Iran on Goldschmidt's number began on Dec. 10. By the end of the day, almost $100 in calls to Iran had already been made. That was just the beginning.

Goldschmidt lost his phone service because of a Southwestern Bell policy regarding "high-tollers," persons with high phone bills. The company can require heavy users of the long-distance service to pay a deposit, Vogel said. Goldschmidt's name showed up on the company's list in December, and a letter was sent requesting a deposit on his bill.

The letter, dated Dec. 22, warned that unless his payment was received by Dec. 26, he would lose his phone service. Goldschmidt, out of town and unaware of the situation, didn't send the phone company anything and his telephone was disconnected.

When Goldschmidt returned on Dec. 28, he panicked when he discovered what had happened.

"I was going to get a call from my parents. They were going to Vail in a storm, and this call was just going to be 'We made it. We're OK,'" he said. "You can imagine their worryment if they called and the phone was disconnected."

So he borrowed a friend's phone and called Southwestern Bell's repair service, the only phone company office open at night. By policy, the service department won't re-connect a phone if a billing problem is involved, but Goldschmidt's anxiety and "hysterics" persuaded them to make an exception.

"They continued my phone on the basis that I was telling the truth," he said. "I appreciate that."

In most cases, re-connections are authorized only after the billing office has heard the complaint and reviewed the customer's earlier bills. A check is made to determine whether the billed party has paid for a call to the number before, Vogel said.

"I would say 99 percent of long-distance calls are legitimate. We have to assume every call (listed on a phone bill) is legitimate until we know otherwise," he said.

A person who finds an error in his bill can usually get it straightened out with one call.

Vogel added that a calm, precise attitude is more helpful to the representative than outraged indignation, and the problem can usually be taken care of quickly.

Vogel predicts that the phone fraud problem in Manhattan will continue. Goldschmidt had his Calling Card number changed Dec. 29, and Vogel said the defrauders will probably try to find another number to use.

Vogel announced Thursday the beginning of an official investigation into the Manhattan incidents but declined to give any specific details.

Southwestern Bell does have some advantages. It can pinpoint the time and place of origin of any call made on their system, the Calling Card number used and the number and location of the party called, even in foreign countries.

In Goldschmidt's case, all of the illegal calls were made from pay phones. For the first week, most of the calls were made from the lobby of Goodnow Hall. The residence hall was closed for break Dec. 16, at which time the caller switched to a pay phone outside the Architecture and Design library on the third floor of Seaton Hall.

Calls were also made from the recreation area downstairs in the Union, Jerry's 66 Service Station, 2000 Tuttle Creek Blvd. and St. Louis, Missouri. Goldschmidt said the appearance of calls from St.

Louis convinced him that at least two persons were using his number.

"I don't know for sure, but I think this is the (St. Louis) airport. It was probably someone leaving," he said.

Vogel agreed the number may have been passed around. When a card is "compromised", he said, calls are often made on it the same day from different parts of the country.

Many people have the attitude that they're not really doing anything illegal, he said.

"What's important here is that it's not just ripping off Southwestern Bell or AT&T," he said. "It's a federal and state offense. When they find out they can go to jail for this, that makes it a different ball game."

Southwestern Bell intends to prosecute the callers if they are caught, Vogel said. He said he is optimistic about finding the callers, and cited the company's 70 percent "catch rate" for fraud.

The most important thing is that persons with calling cards take precautions when using them, he said.

"People have to be conscious of the fact that someone may try to get their number," he said.

Service lists jobs

A bartering service will soon be available at K-State. Greg Hausler, junior in art, began coordinating Job Line for personal gratification.

U-Learn operators will be taking calls from individuals who have odd jobs they wish to have done by students. The job must be related to a major but may be filled by any interested student.

Employers and employees may barter for exchange of services.

Job listings are not intended to offer career opportunities, but should provide practical experience in a major on a short-term basis.

Since Job Line is a community service, ads from businesses will not be accepted. Jobs must offer equal opportunities for employment. The University is not responsible for problems that may occur during terms of employment.

Job Line will be featured in the classified advertising section of the Collegian every Thursday beginning Jan. 26.

U-Learn's phone number is 532-6442.

Mayor offers reward for desk

BOSTON — A trip to the Old Sod awaits the informer who leads the way to an old piece of furniture — the desk believed to have been used by James Michael Curley when he was mayor of Boston. The desk has been sought since new Mayor Raymond L. Flynn, an Irish-American from South Boston, said he wanted to use the massive, handcarved object. Curley, a legendary Irish politician, served as mayor for 16 years in terms ranging from 1914 to 1950. He also served as congressman, governor and city councilor. On Monday, Joseph M. Kelly, vice president and general manager of WROR radio, said the station is offering an all-expense-paid trip for two to Ireland for information leading to the recovery of the desk. "This desk is part of Boston's history and must not be permitted to vanish without a trace," Kelly said. "Someone who loved Mayor Curley must have taken it. . . if they loved Curley, they'll love Ireland." The reward will include airfare, hotel accommodations, meals and $1,000 in spending money.

Drug rehabilitation awaits singer

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Rock singer Sly Stone has been ordered to complete a drug rehabilitation program and pay a $2,500 fine for a possession of cocaine conviction. Lee County Circuit Judge Thomas Reese also placed Stone on three years' probation and suspended a six-month jail sentence Monday. Stone, 39, originally named Silvester Stewart, told the judge he could raise funds for the fine within a few days, but that to do so he needed to be allowed to perform. Larry Mainieri, case manager for Treatment Alternatives to Street Crime, said the drug rehabilitation program requires a minimum six-month stay at the Lee Mental Health Center Inc. Stone pleaded no contest to possession of cocaine and possession of drug paraphernalia last month in connection with his June 22 arrest in a Fort Myers hotel. Stone was a popular music star in the early 1970s with hits including "I Want to Take You Higher" and "Hot Fun in the Summer-time."

Pope plans 10-day Pacific tour

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II will visit Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands and Thailand on his way back from a five-day trip to South Korea next May, Vatican sources reported Tuesday. The Vatican has yet to make an official announcement of the pontiff's projected 10-day tour. The trip to Korea has been announced by the South Korean bishops conference and the Seoul government. More than 30 percent of Papua New Guinea's 3.3 million inhabitants are Roman Catholics. A member of the British Commonwealth, it occupies the eastern half of the island of New Guinea north of Australia. The Solomon Islands, a former British colony, count about 50,000 Roman Catholics or 20 percent of the population. It would be John Paul's 21st trip abroad and second to the Pacific. In February 1981, he visited Pakistan, the Philippines, Guam and Japan.

Commission to ask for hike in Central American aid

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Kissinger Commission on Central America, preparing to submit its report to the White House on today, will recommend an ambitious, long-term program to deal with the region's social and economic crisis, including steps tailored for "basic human needs," officials said. These sources, who asked not to be identified, said Tuesday the commission will recommend a variety of initiatives, including a guaranteed five-year aid package worth $1 billion annually, to help the region recover. Particular steps would be aimed at the millions of Central Americans suffering from malnutrition, disease, illiteracy and lack of adequate housing, they said. Officials said the commission also will urge multilateral re-negotiation of the region's debt and a resurrection of the Central American Common Market. To facilitate long-range planning, the commission said the aid program should not be contingent on year-by-year appropriations. Instead, it should be undertaken as a multiyear package, according to the sources. The measures represent a broad-based effort to raise productivity and living standards in Central America, where the bulk of the population has little stake in preserving the existing systems and often look upon violent revolution as an attractive alternative. The economies of the area have suffered sharp setbacks in recent years because of civil war and low prices for export commodities such as coffee, cotton, bananas and sugar. The Central American Common Market, hailed as a major breakthrough when it was formed in the late 1960s, has been dormant for much of its existence. Commission Chairman Henry A. Kissinger, talking to reporters after a meeting with senators on Tuesday, said he is confident President Reagan "will be very positive" about the report. The president received a summary of the commission's recommendations from Kissinger Friday. White House spokesman Larry Speakes said Tuesday the commission's spending recommendations had reached the White House before last weekend and that they "were factored in" to the president's budget plans. Sen. Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, said he thinks the commission's recommendations have "a very good chance" of approval by Congress. In effect, the commission will recommend a continuation of the administration's present economic and security policies but at intensified levels. In addition to what is expected to be a doubling of economic aid, the commission also will ask for sharp increases in military aid for El Salvador. Administration officials already have said they intend to request a supplemental appropriation in the $100 million to $140 million range. However, the request may go beyond that range once the administration has an opportunity to examine the commission's report, officials said.

Agriculture begins upward climb

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Agriculture began its climb back toward economic health in 1983, largely because of high government subsidies and the impact of acreage reduction programs and widespread drought, say two economists for the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City. Marvin Duncan and Mark Drabenstott wrote in the bank's December Economic Review that further improvements expected this year will depend more on supply-and-demand factors. Reduced grain and livestock supplies resulting from acreage reduction and drought "will mean higher consumer food prices in 1984," the economists wrote in an article titled "Better Times Ahead for Agriculture." "Retail food prices increased only 2 percent in 1983, the smallest increase since 1967 and the eighth year of the past nine that food prices rose less than the overall inflation rate. But retail food prices may rise by 5 to 7 percent in 1984, somewhat ahead of the generally expected overall inflation rate," Duncan and Drabenstott wrote. The Federal Reserve economists said the 1984 outlook is bright for most crops because of sharp reductions in carryover supplies last year due to the "Payment-in-Kind" program and the severe drought across the nation's heartland. They cautioned, however, that large prospective spring plantings "cast a shadow over the outlook." "Net farm income is expected to improve modestly in 1984. Crop prices should be strong through midyear, but the prospect for large crops and continued softness in export markets threaten the longer term price outlook," they wrote. "Many farmers that suffered severe drought damage in 1983 and did not participate in the PIK program face substantial financial difficulty. As a result, a fairly high level of farm foreclosures and partial asset liquidations can be expected in 1984," Duncan and Drabenstott wrote in the review.

Disappearance baffles police

By The Associated Press

DELAVER — A missing woman who had kept more than 100 dogs at her rural Morris County home may have taken a trip or could be the victim of foul play, a sheriff's department spokesman said Tuesday. Undersheriff Tom Furman said Julia H. Stoddard, 68, apparently was not eaten by some of the starving animals as originally believed, because an extensive search had turned up no such evidence. The hunt continued Tuesday for Stoddard in the area near her home, about 70 miles northeast of Wichita. "We are ruling out the part that the dogs may have eaten her, because we found no coat...she always wore a scarf around her neck and she wore a big heavy coat and she always had her purse with her," said Undersheriff Tom Furman. "We would have found something."

Her cane was discovered early in the search leaning against her truck, which was parked outside the house. Sheriff Richard Malek and others had feared that the woman had been eaten by the dogs, many of which were starving when the sheriff first investigated her disappearance on New Year's Eve. However, Furman said authorities now believed that Stoddard either left the house voluntarily or was forcibly removed. It was impossible to determine whether there had been any kind of struggle inside the house or if anything was missing, because of its messy condition, the officer said.

University foresees decline in spring enrollment figures

The number of students attending K-State is expected to decline this semester, a trend continuing from the 1981 fall semester.

"Spring semester generally follows the same patterns set in the fall semester," Don Foster, University registrar, said. "In the fall we were down almost 500 students on campus. I would expect that sort of pattern to continue."

Final enrollment figures for the spring semester will not be available until after the 20th day of classes.

Enrollment fluctuations are based on fall semesters only because the fall semester is usually the "largest term," Foster said.

"Our largest fall ever was the fall of 1981," he said.

K-State's enrollment has been declining ever since, Foster added.

A decline in enrollment is also common among other universities.

"It's a common problem across the United States. The number of high school students graduating is going down," Foster said. But he added that the national decline hasn't greatly affected Big Eight schools yet.

Of the 18,470 students who attended K-State last semester, about 7 percent will not return. Foster cited poor grades and graduation as reasons for the student decline. Incoming freshmen and returning students will fill some of the vacated seats.

"I don't know the exact numbers yet because we are still in the process of enrolling. That (the decrease) normally runs between 400-500 students," he said.

Late enrollment begins today at noon for students who failed to enroll early.

Student arrested in van theft

Marshall County authorities arrested a K-State student shortly before midnight Jan. 2 on a charge of felony theft in connection with the Dec. 29 theft of a K-State Printing Service van from the front of Kedzie Hall, K-State police said.

Daniel Shane Sisley, senior in social sciences and a Manhattan resident, was arrested in the front office of a gypsum plant south of Marysville, police said.

The 1979 Ford van, which had been left running in front of Kedzie, was recovered undamaged.

Colleges require vaccination as measles strike campuses

By College Press Service

IOWA CITY — Students returning to the University of Iowa this month will have to show something else besides a check to get back into classes: proof they've been vaccinated against measles.

Stanford is also requiring students to show proof of immunity to rubella and rubella this month.

And though they're not holding students back from classes now, Notre Dame, Indiana, Illinois and Houston, among other schools, are making measles shots available to students urging them to get immunized. In mid-epidemic last spring, Indiana kept non-immune students from returning from spring break.

Some groups — most notably the Centers for Disease Control and the American College Health Association — now want all schools to force students to prove they're immune before even being admitted to college.

The CDC's Dr. Kim Farley, for example, strongly "encourages universities to adopt policies of proof of immunization prior to entrance."

The reason is that measles is making a comeback among college-aged people. In 1981, there were 101 student measles cases around the country. That grew to 115 in 1982, and then ballooned to some 282 student cases in just the first six months of 1983, an ACHA report found.

Many student cases, moreover, were clustered on certain campuses. Thirty-three of the cases were at Houston last spring. One hundred and seventy-nine University of Indiana students fell ill during the scare. As a result, "things came to a halt" in Bloomington, recalled Dr.

MarJeanne Collins. Collins heads ACHA's immunization program and is a director of the University of Pennsylvania's Student Health Center.

Last spring's epidemic spread across six campuses in the Midwest, Texas, and Florida, according to the CDC in Atlanta.

Since the outbreaks typically arrive in February and March, many schools are increasing their vigilance at the start of this term.

Some believe that, left unchecked, the problem could spread farther during the upcoming measles season.

"Measles," pointed out Dr. Harley Feldrick of Iowa's student health service, "is probably the most contagious of communicable diseases."

An airborne virus, rubella — "hard" or "red" measles — announces itself to the victim with spotted rash, fever, a cough and stuffy head. It is most contagious three-to-four days before the person actually feels sick, Feldrick said.

Rubella is usually a less-debilitating form of measles, but it can cause birth defects in unborn children.

As many as one out of every five college students in the U.S. may be susceptible to the disease, Collins estimated, because people in the 17-to-25-year-old age bracket received a "killed" vaccine when they were in grade school in the 1960s.

The "killed" vaccine gives people a temporary immunity to measles. "Live" measles vaccine, on the other hand, provides people with life-long immunity, Collins said.

Those numbers translate into huge swarms of susceptible students on individual campuses. Purdue has immunized 7,000-to-8,000 students, said Patricia Boardman, who was Purdue's state health representative during last spring's epidemic.

Indiana has gotten to some 23,000 students since the epidemic, while Illinois immunized about 4,000, health officials on those campuses said. Houston has managed to reach 30,000 students since the spring, according to Jeanie Bopp of UH's Health Center.

In preparation for this month's new registration requirement, Iowa began a campus-wide immunization program in November that eventually attracted 12,000 students.

Iowa's Feldrick said the immunization program cost the university itself $7,500. But the state Health Department and the Centers for Disease Control picked up the tab for the vaccine and the extra people hired to administer the shots.

Mud causes drop in cattle prices

By RHONDA WESSEL
Agriculture Editor

Cattle producers in the area are facing a two-way reduction in the prices received for fed cattle because of warmer weather. The freezing and thawing of feedlots are causing mud problems, which result in weight loss and price discounts at the market.

"As a result of the moisture problems we have experienced since Thanksgiving and the extremely cold weather, everything has been kept frozen up. We're now having thawing and re-freezing problems," Mike Sands, assistant professor of economics, said.

Cattle in feedlots lay down in the mud during the day, and at night it freezes on them, Sands said.

"We have had reports of cattle carrying from 50 to 150 pounds of mud on them. This causes a problem from the packers viewpoint since they don't want to pay meat prices for mud. As a result, producers are forced to accept a discount (reduction in price per hundred weight) on fed cattle prices," Sands said.

Cattle maintained in feedlots, which lay and walk around in the mud, don't gain as much as those cattle kept in a dry area.

"It takes a lot of energy for cattle to walk around in the mud. It causes the cattle to lose quite a bit of weight because of the suction effect the mud creates. The mud also adds quite a bit of weight for the cattle to carry around, which also decreases the rate of gain," Mike Christian, Riley County agricultural extension, said.

Cattle usually gain about three pounds per day, but some have actually lost weight because of the cold weather and mud.

"Producers face a two-way cut. The weight gains go down and costs go up, and at the same time net paying prices are reduced," Christian said.

The solution to the mud problem is often considered too expensive to use.

"That (the solution) is to scrape the lots more often to keep snow and mud out of there, and that's hard to do in a large feedlot," Sands said.

Scraping lots involves too much manpower, and washing the cattle just before the sale weights their coats with water. This results in the same type of price discount as the mud, he said.

However, Ken Wilson, manager of the Garden City feedlot near Deerfield, said he and other lot operators are having their pens scraped daily to reduce the amount of mud.

"If it gets warmer and all the mud thaws, the cattle at the center will be up to their stomachs in mud because the pens haven't been scraped here in three or four years," Ron Pope, resident assistant of beef research, said.

There are several problems which could arise if the thawing and the freezing continues until April, as predicted by Sands.

"Our calving period is February and March. If cows lay down in the cold wet muddy area to have their calves it will increase the chances of a virus. The cold and wet is definitely a detriment to young calves," Christian said.

Sands also said the mud will be a prime spot for flies, and other parasites to utilize as a breeding ground.

"With the thawing and re-freezing of the mud on the cattle's coats, there will be a tendency for them to rub up against things. This could cause hair loss, and if it develops into large patches of hair missing, it also could cause problems," Christian said.

State poultry producers prepare for possible flu outbreak

By LINDA MORRELL
Contributing Writer

Kansas poultry producers are taking precautions against a highly pathogenic strain of Avian Influenza which has plagued the poultry industry in three eastern states. There have been no cases reported in Kansas.

Since late October of 1983, 800 million chickens have died or been destroyed due to the disease. Poultry industries in Pennsylvania, Virginia and New Jersey have been affected by the disease, Albert Adams, professor of animal sciences and industry, said.

This outbreak is different than the mild strain of the influenza that affected turkeys two years ago. Decreased egg production was the major result of the milder strain, Adams said.

Decreased egg production is also an effect of Avian Influenza. Respiratory problems, increased mortality, swelling of the face and head and sudden death are among the most prevalent symptoms of diseased chickens.

"The disease is not transmittable to humans, and humans cannot catch the virus from eating eggs or from handling the poultry," Adams said.

Although most of the infected chickens are destroyed to prevent further spreading of the disease, some are kept for research purposes. K-State researchers, however, won't take part in this research unless an outbreak of Avian Influenza occurs in Kansas, Adams said.

Poultry producers across the state are also taking precautions to prevent an outbreak of the influenza.

"We've closed our farm to outside people. There is no real reason why we should take the risk of exposing ourselves to financial liability just to make someone happy (with a tour)," Jack McKee, president of Key Milling Company of Clay Center, said.

Another precaution taken by employees of Key Milling is requiring employees to change their shoes when they enter and leave the poultry buildings.

McKee and Adams said they believe the influenza is transmitted by manure of migratory waterfowl. Removing the shoes prevents manure from being transported.

Claude Schwab, owner of Schwab Hatchery of La Crosse, said he believes sparrows instead of waterfowl carry the disease. Schwab takes precautions by giving his poultry medicated feed and by taking blood samples.

An increase in egg prices in this area is a result of cold weather and the disease, McKee said.

Price increases for poultry products vary among producers and retailers.

An employee of a Manhattan grocery store said egg prices have increased "mainly since the Christmas season from 89 cents to $1.19 (per dozen eggs)."

Freeze creates few campus problems

The snowstorm and subzero temperatures that struck the state before Christmas presented only minor problems on campus, said Jack Watson, superintendent of shops for University Facilities.

The main problems encountered by the department were snow removal and broken water lines and heating coils.

"We (the campus) were not affected nearly as badly as other businesses in Manhattan and the state," Watson said. "I feel very fortunate."

University Facilities first had to remove snow from University sidewalks and parking lots, which took approximately three days and nights to complete. Most of the work was done between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. when daytime duties could not be done and cars were not in the parking lots, he said.

A new snowblower purchased for the University eased the burden of snow removal. The snowblower shortens the amount of time required to fill a contracted truck with snow.

"When it snows, we windrow it (the snow) into the middle of the road and it gets picked up by a front-end loader with the snowblower on it," Watson said. "The snowblower can load a truck in 10 to 15 seconds, compared to when it used to take five to eight minutes."

He said the former method of loading the snow consisted of using the front-end loader with a bucket. The new way saves up to 50 percent on hauling fees.

Broken water lines and heating coils produced the most weather-related problems on campus as a result of the subzero temperatures.

"We've had numerous heating coils freeze up and break, and at least six (water) lines were broken," Watson said. He said the damage could have been much worse considering the record low temperatures.

The damage resulted from the frigid air coming into contact with bends in the coils and lines, causing breakage. Watson said water can freeze at the bends within a minute.

However, most of the damage was not known until recently when mild temperatures thawed the water in the pipes, causing leakage.

Sorority may take action against zoning decision

Although no formal action has been taken, the Kappa Kappa Gamma House Corp., 517 Fairchild Terrace, is considering challenging a decision made by the Manhattan Board of Zoning Appeals, said Joseph Knopp, the attorney representing the sorority. The decision would force the Kappas to tear up two parking spaces in their annex parking lot, he said.

The Kappas encountered problems last year when their annex parking lot was found to be in violation of a city zoning law variance requiring off-street parking to be at least 25 feet away from the property line.

Two parking spaces are within the barrier. An appeal to the zoning board last November ended in failure when the Kappas were told to have the two spaces removed by July 1, 1984.

Knopp said his client is challenging the board's right to force the removal of the spaces. He said the house is working with the city attorney and city planners to determine what can be done.

Knopp said he would have to talk to his client before commenting further on the matter.

CHEF CAFE FAST BECOMING A FAVORITE AMONG STUDENTS

Downtown, nestled just a quarter of a block south of Poyntz on Fourth Street lies Manhattan's oldest family owned and operated restaurant, "the Chef Cafe." The Chef Cafe is to downtown like Kite's is to Aggieville, a big favorite with a long standing tradition.

Recently the Chef, after 30 years in the same area, just finished major expansion and remodeling which has been met with very favorable response especially among K-State students, and it's no wonder. There isn't an item on the menu over $3.95 and that includes the full course meals complete with the best salad bar downtown has to offer.

Couple this with the fact that students get a 10% discount card good for the whole semester just for the asking, it's no wonder they've found a home away from home.

And if you're a movie buff, staying open till 9 p.m. and being just across from the Warehouse Theater, enables many a movie goer to find the best possible combination for dinner and theater in town.

So if you're tired of eating out of a paper bag when, for the same price, you can enjoy homemade soups, pies, cookies, muffins, chili and daily specials then I'll be seeing you at "the Chef." And oh yes, don't forget to ask for your student discount card.

U.S. education study reveals differences in aid allotments

By The College Press Service

Women students often get less financial aid than men, even though they tend to need more aid money than their male counterparts, according to a new U.S. Department of Education study.

For the 1981-82 school year, women students got only 72-cent grant money for every $1 awarded to men, yet women earned only 68-cent for every dollar earned by men students, the report showed.

And despite lower aid awards to women students, nearly twice as many women are classified as "independent" on their student aid evaluations.

"There always has been an inequity in the financial aid awards to men and women," noted Mary Moran, the consultant to the Education Dept. who authored the study.

"Some of it could be discrimination, and some of it is due to aspects of the student aid formula used in calculating award amounts," she said.

In the Pell Grant program, for example, more women students receive aid than men, but women's awards averaged $880. Men's awards averaged $913.

Similarly, under the College Work-Study program the average aid amount for women was only $753, while men averaged $830.

"A lot of (the problem) is more an institutional issue," Moran noted. "Some of it could be discrimination, and some of it is due to aspects of the student aid formula used in calculating award amounts," she said.

Schools need to channel more of their campus-based aid money to part-time, non-traditional students, she said, since many women aren't able to attend classes full-time.

Schools should also develop fairer standards for computing child care expenses, she added, which are used in determining students' aid needs.

Former Secretary of the Interior James Watt is hitting the campus lecture circuit this month, commanding as much as $15,000 in honoraria and fees for one night appearances, his New York booking agency said.

"(Watt) will begin lecturing as of January, 1984, at colleges including the University of Miami, Texas A&M, Fordham and Marquette," reported Don Walker with Harry Walker Inc., the booking agency which is scheduling Watt's tour.

"Watt is one of the most sought-after speakers in the country right now," Walker said. "I won't divulge exactly what he's getting paid, but several newspapers have reported he collects $15,000 plus expenses for a standard honorarium."

The former secretary, who resigned last fall after a controversy over his characterization of the people he'd appointed to a government panel, hasn't always been one of the "most sought-after speakers" on the nation's campuses, of course.

Organized by environmental groups, students at Yale, Western State College, Baylor, Arizona and the University of Washington, among others, participated in a number of "Dump Watt" rallies and petition drives from September through November 1981.

Student newspaper editorialists at Missouri, Michigan, Penn., Alabama, Texas Christian, Southern Cal and Oregon State, among others, regularly targeted Watt for criticism during his tenure.

Ohio State students' plans to picket a Republican fund-raiser scheduled at OSU's union building last February forced Watt to move the banquet off campus.

Now that Watt is out of office, however, some schools are willing to pay him to visit for both educational and financial reasons.

"We scheduled him because we wanted somebody to come in and speak on environmental issues, and we expect his appearance to generate a lot of local interest," explained Judy Schields, Marquette's assistant dean of students.

Watt "won't actually be giving a speech" when he appears at Marquette February 16, Schields said, but will participate in more of a "Meet the Press" forum, responding to questions from a panel of students and faculty.

"We expect a good deal of media coverage, and strong attendance from students, the general public and special interest groups."

Schields won't say how much Watt's appearance will cost the school, but she does think it will easily sell out the 1200-seat theatre where Watt will speak.

Hallmark begins building visitors center

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Hallmark Cards, Inc. said Tuesday it has started construction of a $1.5 million visitors center focusing on the history of the company and the greeting card industry.

The facility, which is designed to accommodate 100,000 visitors a year, is scheduled to open Jan. 10, 1985, at the start of Hallmark's 75th anniversary celebration. It is dedicated to Joyce C. Hall, the Hallmark founder.

Hallmark President David H. Hughes said one area at the center will feature the company's history, another will focus on the Hallmark Hall of Fame television series and a third exhibit will demonstrate how the company's products are made.

The 10,000 square-foot visitors center will be located in the Crown Center complex.

Lady 'Cats stop Shockers 92-71

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

A strong performance from freshman starter Carlisa Thomas and 17 second-half points from Angie Bonner helped lift the Lady 'Cat basketball team to a 92-71 victory over the Wichita State Shockers Monday evening at Ahearn Field House.

The 5-foot-10-inch Thomas, who connected on six of 12 field goals and two of three free throws for 14 points, also led all players with a game-high 10 rebounds. It was an all-around showing for the Jacksonville, Fla., native, said Head Coach Lynn Hickey.

"Carlisa had a good game and made a lot of things happen," Hickey said of Thomas, who also dished out six assists in the contest. "She helped us on the fast break (and) either scored or helped other people score."

One of those other people scoring was 6-foot-1-inch Bonner, who used a seven-of-10 free throw performance in the second half to lead all scorers with 23 points. She also added eight rebounds.

And it was Bonner who got the Lady 'Cats rolling in the game's early moments, canning a short inside bucket for a 2-0 K-State lead. The Lady 'Cats opened up a 15-10 advantage with the aid of two consecutive shots by 6-foot-1-inch sophomore Jennifer Jones, who hit a 15-foot left wing jumper and a driving lay up off a Thomas assist.

WSU later fought back to take a five-point lead of its own, outscoring the 'Cats 12-2 within a six-minute period for a 22-17 advantage.

K-State freshman Susan Green's 20-foot jumper from the right wing with 4:08 remaining knotted the score at 26 and the 'Cats never trailed again in the contest. K-State took a slim 35-33 lead off Jennifer Jones' 20-foot baseline jumper with two seconds left in the half.

It was cold shooting that accounted for K-State's first half offensive woes, with the Lady 'Cats hitting only 15 of 39 shots for a 38.5 percent showing from the field.

"We shot really bad in the first half, but came back in the second half and did a good job," said Hickey, who watched her squad shoot 59 percent in the second half of play. "It was a good team effort."

Sophomore Cassandra Jones hit a shot from the top of the key to open the second half of play and set in motion K-State's 57-point second half explosion. This last 20 minutes of play was also a fine display of K-State defensive work, Hickey said.

"Tonight would have been an easy one to blow," she said. "We didn't even let it get close (in the second half)."

Indeed, K-State kept the Shockers

at bay, increasing its lead to 15 points within the second half's first five minutes of play. A Thomas free throw with 21 seconds remaining gave the Lady 'Cats their largest lead of the night at 23 points before K-State closed the game with the 92-71 win.

Allison Daniel and Lillian Dendy led the WSU cause with 17 and 14 points respectively while Jenny Parr added 12. Thomas' defense of both Parr and standout Lisa Hodgson, who was averaging 16.3 points per game prior to Monday's encounter, was vital in the Lady 'Cat win, Hickey said. Hodgson scored only eight points while all of Parr's came in the second half of play.

"Carlisa was on both of them so that explains it," Hickey said of the WSU pair's low scoring. "(She) did a good job defensively."

Cassandra Jones followed Bonner in scoring with 16 points while Jennifer Jones rounded out the four player double-figure attack with 11. Jennifer also added eight rebounds.

The win improves the 10th-ranked Lady 'Cats' record to 10-3 before heading into Big Eight Conference play Jan. 18 against Oklahoma State University. The three Lady 'Cat losses came to Oregon State, and top-ranked University of Texas and Old Dominion.

In the Oregon State loss during the Guisti Tournament in Portland, Ore., K-State played without the services of Bonner, who suffered a sprained ankle in the squad's first tourney game. The Lady 'Cats took third in the tournament, placing Cassandra Jones on the all-tournament team and winning two of their three contests.

Against Texas Dec. 30, K-State watched its 31-game winning streak at Ahearn Field House come to an end with a slim 82-78 loss to the Longhorns. Sophomore Tina Dixon ripped the nets for 35 points behind a 17-of-20 field goal performance and also grabbed nine rebounds.

"Just one break here or there and we would have won that game," said Hickey. "I thought Texas played a little harder, but we were better than they were."

Dixon came back strong once again in the Oral Roberts University contest Jan. 2, scoring 19 points and grabbing nine rebounds in the 79-62 win. K-State lost Dixon's services in the early moments of the Old Dominion contest Jan. 5 due to a knee injury and suffered a 92-64 setback to the top-ranked Lady Monarchs. Dixon will be out of action for approximately three weeks, Hickey said.

"We're not where I want to be in intensity wise because Tina's out of the line-up," Hickey said. "We haven't been all together as a team for two weeks (because of injuries). I still think we can be super competitive in the Big Eight."

Staff/Andy Nelson

Price returns as Lady 'Cat opponent

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

Wichita State University Assistant Women's Basketball Coach Kim Price celebrated Homecoming, Jan. 9. But Price wasn't celebrating with her Shocker basketball squad.

Price came home to Ahearn Field House, where she competed for four years in the purple and white uniform of a Lady 'Cat.

Price, who is ranked among K-State's top five in rebounds and free throws, graduated from a Lady 'Cat squad that last year took first in the Big Eight Conference and finished among the nation's top 16 teams with a 25-7 record.

While she averaged only 3.1 points per game last season on a talent-loaded K-State squad, Price has tasted her share of success in the collegiate basketball ranks.

She had a season-high 11 points and five rebounds against the University of Arkansas last year and canned a career-high 27 points against the arch-rival University of Kansas Jayhawks in 1980.

"I'd certainly like to have her back," Hickey said.

Price did come back — with a crew of black and gold Shockers behind her — in what would prove to be a 21-point loss to her 10th-ranked alma mater.

And what difficulty does coaching opposite many of the same girls you once played with entail? It's a matter of adjusting both her personal feelings and coaching thoughts to the situation, Price said.

"I was looking forward to it (the game)," she said. "I miss playing a lot."

And although she knew the style of several of the Lady 'Cat players, it's not always easy to predict the game plan of even the best known opponent, she said.

"I thought I could help out the team with telling individual traits of some of the players," Price said. "I didn't know if it would really help or not."

And it's a different type of ballgame when WSU takes the court when compared with the ball Price played as a K-State senior — slow it down and be extremely patient is WSU Head Coach Karen Harden's motto, Price said.

"It's a lot different," she said. "We try to set up the ball more and to be more patient. We have some quickness, but not as much as K-State."

The ability to adjust to different players talents and abilities is what makes for a good, effective coach, said Hickey, who herself had to make the adjustment to first-year coaching.

"As a player you can be pretty selfish, but as a coach you learn how to read others and utilize their talents," Hickey said.

And Price will quickly learn the attributes that a collegiate coach needs in order to be successful, said Hickey, who added that Price's basketball talent alone surpasses any player on the WSU squad.

"You have to be somebody who really likes to sacrifice, somebody who is really disciplined and somebody who cares for people," she said. "You also need to have a knowledge of the game and be able to break down skills and strategies. You have to be a teacher."

"I think Kim will have to become much more dynamic, but I think she'll do a good job," Hickey said. "Everything is on her side."

And for Price, watching players improve as she once did under her coaching staff is a particularly enjoyable experience.

"I really like it," she said. "It's something I've always wanted to do. It's so nice to see people improve. It (coaching) is something I want to stay in for awhile."

And staying at Wichita State is definitely in the plans for Price — who looks upon all her games as learning experiences — even when coming home against K-State.

"I just want to learn," she said. "I really like WSU and the atmosphere, so if I stay here it'll be fine with me."

THE UNKNOWN FAN
Guest Columnist

Hey, folks. How y'all doin'? You know me — the Unknown Fan. I make it a habit to hang out at stadiums housing losing teams in the NFL with a brown lunch sack over my head. I've been in some pretty nice little towns over the years; New Orleans, Los Angeles, and just this season I divided much of my time between Houston and Tampa Bay.

But I'm not just a professional football fan. Heck no. I'm versatile. I know a lot about anything. I'm the guy that argues with everything everyone else has to say, but it's for their own good.

Recently I've been reading all sorts of lists where people are giving out their own make-believe awards for anything ranging from best coverage of a football game to biggest blunder by an announcer. So I figure what the heck. I'll give out my own awards — The Baggies.

The Reversible Baggie Award — My first award goes to Howard Cosell for announcing that he'd never cover professional boxing again, and then turning around and interviewing boxer Sugar Ray Leonard during halftime of a Monday Night Football Game — well, that little monkey.

The Doggie Baggie Award — This one was a toss-up. I decided to split the award between those coaching, refereeing, criticizing, analyzing, know-it-all announcers Al McGuire and Billy Packard. It's amazing that they find time to commentate college basketball games while they constantly knock coaches' strategies, referees' calls, players' shooting styles and even the color of sports jackets that coaches wear. Sometimes they act as though they know as much as I do.

The Barf Baggie Award — This award goes, not to a person, but to a revolutionary idea used by CBS. I'm talking about the CBS Chalkboard. Originally, it was a good idea, but if I see John Madden describe the blocking patterns of the Redskins' "Hogs" one more time, I think I'll puke.

The Cellophane Baggie Award — The Royals' Willie Wilson nabs this award. Besides belly-aching about the harshness of his punishment, he said he only has to be a role model for his own kids and the young baseball fans who idolize him. Willie gets this award for being one heck of a parent.

The Put-A-Baggie-Over-It Award — This one goes to all the Nebraska Cornhusker fans who, after their one-point loss to the Miami Hurricanes in the Orange Bowl, keep saying, "Well, we had enough guts to go for two." Considering that they went into the game 11-point favorites, all I can say is, "You went for two and finished number two." So much for the best team ever.

Overall it was a pretty interesting year in the world of sports. There were plenty of losers to keep everyone happy. I don't know where I'll be spending the 1984 pro football season, but a visit to Dallas may be in the plans. Afterwards, who knows. It may be time for the Second Annual Baggies.

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Carl Lewis, winner of three events in both the World Track and Field Championships and the USA Championships with a series of dazzling performances, was named Tuesday as The Associated Press' Male Athlete of the Year for 1983.

Lewis was the winner of the 100-meter dash and the long jump and a member of the United States' world record-setting 400-meter team in the inaugural World Championships at Helsinki, Finland, in August. He also was winner of the 100, 200 and long jump in the National Championships at Indianapolis in June and was an easy winner in the voting.

In the balloting by a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters, he received 37 votes, compared to 22 for runner-up Wayne Gretzky, the record-smashing scorer for the Edmonton Oilers of the National Hockey League who was the AP Male Athlete of the Year in 1982.

Gretzky won his third straight NHL scoring title with 196 points, including a record 125 assists, set a playoff record with 38 points and was named the league's Most Valuable Player for the fourth straight year.

Center Moses Malone, who led the Philadelphia 76ers to the National Basketball Association championship, finished third with 19 votes, and outfielder Dale Murphy of the Atlanta Braves, winner of the National League's MVP Award for the second consecutive year, was fourth with 13 votes.

The AP's Woman Athlete of the Year will be announced Thursday.

"Last year was the best ever for me," said Lewis, who plans to try to match the feat of the great Jesse Owens — his idol — in this year's Summer Olympics by shooting for gold medals in the 100, 200, long jump and relay.

"I feel very good about winning the award," continued the 22-year-old from Willingboro, N.J., who attends the University of Houston. "Just in the United States alone, there are tons of good athletes and then there are guys like Gretzky, who ruled the NHL."

Lewis outshone them all. First, in the USA Championships, he won the 100-meter title for the third consecutive time in 10.27 seconds. He then captured the long jump with a leap of 28 feet, 10 1/2 inches — the second-best ever and the longest ever at sea level. Lewis capped his sensational performance by winning the 200 in 19.75, an American record, the best ever at sea level and the second-fastest in history, only .03 off the world mark of 19.72, held by Pietro Mennea of Italy.

He most likely would have broken the world record in the 200 if he had not slowed slightly with a big lead in the closing meters, raised his hands into the air in victory and failed to dip at the finish line.

Still, he had completed the first 100-200-long jump triple in the national championships in 97 years.

Gibbs remembers Redskins' early losses

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Washington Redskins' 0-5 start during his 1981 rookie year as coach remains as vivid to Joe Gibbs as the team's Super Bowl victory last year over the Miami Dolphins.

"I read through the (1981) clippings, and it was kind of a shock to see what was said and written," said Gibbs, who is preparing the Redskins for their second straight trip to the National Football League title game — this time against the Los Angeles Raiders on Jan. 22 in Tampa, Fla.

"Those are the kinds of things that sit in the back of your mind and never leave, things that were said about us as a team and about us as individuals."

Pete Cronan, the special teams captain, said, "When I first came here, the main concern was winning a game, any game. Now, it's winning The Game."

Quarterback Joe Theismann remembers that dismal start, too. He was the brash successor to Billy Kilmer and the rest of the Over-the-Hill-Gang, the man who had written a book on quarterbacking before he had played a down in the NFL. A meeting between Gibbs and Theismann apparently turned things around.

"If we hadn't had that meeting, I wouldn't be here today," Theismann said as he and his teammates took a few days off before getting ready for the Raiders, whom they beat 37-35 earlier this season.

"I know my rear end was on the trading block. You can talk to all the executives here and they can deny it, but we all know a little bit different," he said.

Meanwhile, the Redskins are still recovering from their 24-21 NFC championship victory over the San Francisco 49ers, which Theismann called the most physical game he's ever played.

John Riggins showed the effects of the game, with bruises on his arms and a big, red gash on his cheek. Asked how he got the cut, the fullback said, "Snipers."

Gibbs said the status of All-Pro kick returner Mike Nelms, out the last four weeks with injuries, is still up in the air. "We'll wait until the last possible moment to decide," he said.

Gibbs said the defending Super Bowl champions "were lucky last year because we just sort of fell into everything."

"I still want everyone to enjoy themselves this year, but there is a line in there where you have to have your privacy and practice and concentrate," he said.

Theismann sums it up this way: "There are only two teams in football that are still playing. We have the good fortune to be one of them. If that isn't enough to get you excited, you're not alive."

Decker injures calf, will miss indoor races

By The Associated Press

EUGENE, Ore. — Mary Decker, the world's dominant women's middle-distance runner in 1983, will skip her two scheduled indoor races this season due to a minor calf injury.

Her coach, Dick Brown, said Tuesday that Decker had missed a few days of training recently because of the injury but had resumed training in Eugene.

Brown described the injury as a "minor tear" in her right calf.

"We decided it would be wise for her not to do the indoor season," Brown said, saying that Decker didn't want to jeopardize her ability to reach her peak in time for the Summer Olympic Games at Los Angeles.

Decker, who won the 1,500-meter and 3,000-meter races in the inaugural World Track and Field Championships at Helsinki, Finland in 1983, had been scheduled to compete in the Vitalis U.S. Olympic International meet Feb. 11 at East Rutherford, N.J. and the Michelob Invitational Feb. 17 at San Diego.

Flores says Raiders 'aggressive,' not 'dirty'

By The Associated Press

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. — Over the years, the Los Angeles Raiders have methodically cultivated an image that fits their name, the black and silver they wear and the crossed swords and eye patch-sporting player-pirate on their helmets.

Along with that has come another reputation, one which Coach Tom Flores deems unwarranted.

"We're not a dirty team," said the Raiders' coach. "We are an aggressive team. Aggressive teams get penalties; finesse teams don't."

Some of the Seattle Seahawks' players, never using the word "dirty," mentioned the after-the-whistle pushing and shoving that marked last Sunday's 30-14 loss to Los Angeles in the American Football Conference title game.

"We have a reputation," said Flores. "We wear black and we do things our own way. It stems from management."

Management is Al Davis, the Raiders' managing general partner who favors black attire, has been branded a "maverick" by National Football League Commissioner Pete Rozelle and who stubbornly battled the league in court and won the right to move his club from Oakland to Los Angeles.

His and his club's "own way" is certainly successful. When the Raiders meet the Washington Redskins at Tampa, Fla., in the Super Bowl Jan. 22, it will be their second appearance in the National Football League championship game in three years and their fourth in the 18-year history of the game.

Many of the Raiders, such as outspoken defensive end Lyle Alzado, fit the club's tough image to perfection. Others, like quarterback Jim Plunkett, running back Marcus Allen, and Flores, don't.

Despite the team's success, Flores, who guided the Raiders to the 1981 Super Bowl title, is not as well known as some other NFL coaches who have produced much less spectacular results.

"I'd be lying if I said it wasn't annoying," said the 45-year-old Flores, a former Raiders' quarterback who has a 54-27 overall record and 6-1 postseason mark in his five years as the team's coach. "Even when you're a little kid, you want your mom or dad to pat you on the head. "In this business, the only measure of success is whether you win."

Perhaps contributing to Flores' lack of publicity is the fact that he is not a particularly inventive coach, instead preferring to stick with the tried-and-proven and emphasize sound fundamentals.

He said he considers himself "sort of from the old school. We still have two backs in our backfield and we don't do exotic things offensively."

Flores' lack of flamboyance may be one of his prime strengths as a coach.

"He keeps us on an even keel," said veteran offensive guard Mickey Marvin. "We don't hit peaks and valleys."

Flores gave the Raiders Tuesday and Wednesday off, then the team will return to practice at their El Segundo training facilities Thursday through Saturday before taking Sunday off and flying to Florida Monday.

'Beehive' scenes show intimacy but lack proper cinematography

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

"Spirit of the Beehive" is an evocative journey into the mind of a lonely little girl from a remote Spanish village. Her parents belong to the upper class and are preoccupied with their own interests to the extent that they give their daughter, Ana, very little attention. Her father spends larger amounts of his time with his beehives, and her mother dreams of places not as remote as the village.

When Ana and her older sister go to the town hall to see a showing of "Frankenstein," Ana sees in the monster someone who is misunderstood and in need of a friend. Her sister tells her stories about how the monster didn't really die in the movie and that he is living in a farmstead on the outskirts of the village. Ana then sets out to find and befriend the monster.

Director Victor Erice gives the film an underplayed tone that keeps the plot from becoming overly sentimental or sensationalistic. The focus is always upon the intimate moments of day-to-day life that cause the little girl to behave as she does.

After convincing Ana that the monster is alive, Ana's sister continues to play tricks that only cause

Review

Ana to believe even more strongly in Frankenstein's existence. She insists that the monster is a spirit that can hear you speak, wherever you may be. Late at night Ana speaks to the sky, as if Frankenstein is really listening to her words.

Ana's father also helps to establish Ana's frame of mind toward the monster through his interest in mushrooms. He takes the girls with him on mushroom gathering expeditions and explains to them about poisonous types. Ana watches with fascination as he grinds a poisonous mushroom into the earth with his heel — seeing the similarity between the poisonous mushroom that must be destroyed and the monster which was misunderstood in the movie "Frankenstein."

When an escaped convict finds refuge in the farm shed, Ana believes the man to be Frankenstein. She gives the man food and clothing until the authorities learn of his whereabouts.

"Spirit of the Beehive" is full of memorable and intimate scenes that draw with great precision the character of Ana. The child that portrays Ana, Ana Torrent, is so strikingly beautiful that she commands attention every moment she is on the screen.

The film is not without its flaws, though. The most noticeable flaw is the style of cinematography used. Virtually all of the scenes in "Spirit of the Beehive" are filmed very statically, without any of the imagination present in the film's plot. Each shot is exquisitely framed and photographed, but the scenes are nearly all cold and distant, never allowing the mystery and wonder in Ana's beliefs to be fully conveyed.

The film is prefaced with the words "Once upon a time . . ." but only on rare occasion does the film's style reflect the imagination that those words seem to indicate. One scene that works quite well shows Ana sitting beside a moonlit pond as she envisions the monster walking up beside her, as happened in the movie.

Far too often the film makers seem content to simply convey beautiful images, but unfortunately these images only detract from the film's simple but brilliant story. Once the convict enters the film, however, the plot takes prominence, carrying the film with a great deal of momentum.

Police identify suspect in family slayings

By The Associated Press

FORT WAYNE, Ind. — The prime suspect in the bludgeoning deaths of a local newspaperman and his family was ordered held Tuesday under maximum $200,000 bond on an unrelated burglary charge.

Calvin D. Perry III of Fort Wayne was arraigned in Allen County Circuit Court on a Class A burglary charge — the most severe under state law — in connection with a Jan. 5 burglary in which a 78-year-old woman was beaten.

Police, who have been questioning Perry since his arrest Thursday, have identified the youth as the prime suspect in the Sept. 19 slayings of Dan Osborne, 35, editorial page editor of the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel; his wife, Jane, 34; and the couple's 11-year-old son, Ben. Perry has not been charged in the Osborne slayings.

"We would expect some additional developments late this week or early next week," Allen County Prosecutor Stephen M. Sims said after the arraignment.

He added that there "certainly is a probability" that Perry will be charged with the Osborne deaths.

Because of suspicions that Perry is linked to 15 other crimes, prosecutors sought an increase in his bond. Judge Thomas L. Ryan granted the request Tuesday, increasing Perry's bond from $75,000 to $200,000.

Ryan said a public defender would be appointed for Perry.

At a news conference Monday, Sims and Police Chief David C. Riemen said Perry had made admissions against himself in connection with the Osborne slayings. Riemen said Perry gave detectives information about the Osborne slayings that never was made public.

Osborne and his son were beaten to death with a baseball bat while they slept. Mrs. Osborne was bludgeoned with a portable radio and her assailant's fists. The Osbornes' daughter, Caroline, 2, was sexually attacked but survived.

An FBI psychological profile of the possible killer said he was most likely white and between 21 and 27. Caroline Osborne said her attacker had light skin.

Safety precautions prevent deaths due to winter cold

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

Despite the recent warm weather trend, winter is bound to make a comeback, warns the U.S. Department of Commerce.

According to a departmental release, lack of preparation and caution caused nearly 4,500 Americans to perish from excessive cold in the 1970s, a number which reflects a sharp increase over previous decades.

Medical researchers believe the reason winter cold is claiming more lives than before is because Americans, in general, are older. The severe winter weather is harmful to the elderly, who are more vulnerable to cold temperatures.

The commerce department estimates one of every two Americans live in an area exposed to winter storm dangers.

The rest of the winter can be safer if those living in dangerously cold areas become familiar with winter weather warnings and terms, according to the department's National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA).

The NOAA offers the following information on how to cope with winter weather.

— When the possibility of a winter storm exists, there is a chance of being stranded at home for several days without services and utilities. Battery-powered equipment, such as flashlights and radios, an adequate supply of heating fuel, an emergency heating system and food that requires no refrigeration or cooking should be on hand.

— If you must go outdoors in very cold weather, overexertion should be avoided because cold weather puts an extra strain on the heart.

— Dress appropriately for the weather conditions. Thin layers of loose-fitting clothing will trap heat, yet allow air to circulate. Mittens and tightly woven, water-repellent outer clothing also help trap the insulated air. Remember to always cover your head because 40 to 50 percent of one's body heat escapes from the head and neck.

— A good winter check-up also includes checking your car. Make sure the car's engine, amount of fuel, ignition and exhaust systems, tires, brakes, heater, windshield wipers, lights and the antifreeze level are all maintained.

— A shovel, booster cables, flares, extra clothing, high-calorie foods and bags of sand should also be included.

If your car breaks down and shelter is unattainable, pull off the road, stay calm and remain in the car where you will have a better chance of being rescued. Don't try to walk to safety during a blizzard.

Mike Bradshaw, assistant professor of extension home economics and a safety specialist, also emphasized the importance of staying with your car. He noted that besides the major dangers of exposure to the cold, the threat of carbon monoxide poisoning exists.

"When staying in a car, keep a window open a bit for fresh air," Bradshaw said. "Run the engine and heater sparingly, watch out for drowsiness and keep the exhaust pipe clear of snow."

Carbon monoxide poisoning resulted in the death of two Air Force cadets en route to Colorado Springs during the Thanksgiving weekend. Bradshaw said he believes the fatalities could have been avoided.

"The two that died were parked in their car under an overpass where the exhaust didn't get blown away well enough," he said. "If they had parked out in the open, they may have lived."

Bradshaw and the NOAA agree that when stranded in a car, body heat can be maintained by moving the arms and legs vigorously. It is also important to never allow all the occupants of a car to sleep at the same time.

State board presents proposals, lauds Carlin's education stand

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The State Board of Education presented its list of legislative recommendations to Gov. John Carlin Tuesday and applauded the commitment he made to education in his message to the Kansas Legislature earlier in the day.

The board included in its recommendations Carlin's proposals to require all teachers to pass a test before certification, to make state funds available to school districts for in-service teacher training and to continue minimum competency testing in grade and junior high schools.

The board went beyond Carlin's agenda for education to recommend state funds for replacement of equipment at area vocational-technical schools and for 100 percent of special education excess costs.

Carlin has never sought full funding for special education.

"You only have so many dollars," he said. "Rather than fund one program at 100 percent and be short, I'd rather see some local commitment."

The board also requested state law be amended to require the Legislature to approve money for vo-tech schools before the schools' implementation. Currently, the state board can approve an application for a new vo-tech school but the school cannot start up unless the Legislature provides funds for it.

"The attorney general has informed us that we cannot turn down applications simply because we didn't have funding," said Board Member Evelyn Whitcomb of Wichita. "Approval without funding raises false hopes."

Carlin shared with the board members the comments he received at public meetings last year.

"One thing I got strong support for was my opposition to lengthening the school day — and I wasn't just talking to kids," Carlin said.

"We need to first make better use of the time we have."

However, Carlin said he did not oppose efforts by individual school districts to lengthen the school day.

The board also recommended: — Credit hour aid for community colleges and Washburn University be increased by 50 cents per credit hour.

— Out-district state aid for community colleges and Washburn University be increased by $2 per credit hour.

— A blue-ribbon committee be appointed to study teacher salaries.

— The board be authorized to enter into an interstate compact for certification of educational personnel.

— The moratorium on Type II vo-tech schools be lifted and a Type II school be authorized for Johnson County. Type I schools serve only one school district. Type II schools can serve a larger area.

TV helps students to read

By ANDY OSTMEYER
Features Editor

A reading program developed by CBS is designed to help students improve their reading and vocabulary skills, as well as stimulate them into further thinking. The program also helps to increase the value of the popular medium as an educational tool, Bill Conley, promotion manager for WIBW, said.

Known as the CBS Television Reading Program, it has been a service of WIBW in Topeka for the past several years and is becoming more popular with each program, Conley said.

When CBS produces a movie or a show, they send out a condensed version of the actual shooting script and a comprehensive teacher's guide to participating schools. The guide contains exercises in vocabulary skills, enrichment and understanding to enhance the student's learning.

"It's a great program. It really is," Conley said. And many of the area teachers who have participated in the program agree.

Pat Anderson, chairman of the English Department at Junction City High School, is one of the teachers who believes in the value of the program.

"Their (students') understanding of it (the movie) was certainly enhanced by it," Anderson said, referring to the scripts and the three days of preparation which went into it.

Anderson said she had a ninth grade class, which was not successful with English before, read the script and do some of the exercises.

Class members asked questions which they would probably not have asked if they had just watched the movie without preparing for it, she said.

Watching the program was not a mandatory assignment, but she estimated that approximately half of the class watched the movie.

"I was so pleased that even half of them watched it," she said, referring to the movie "Cook and Peary: The Race to the Pole".

The movie centered around the controversy over who reached the North Pole first: Robert Peary or Frederick Cook.

Anderson said several of her students checked out books on the subject. Some of the students, who were not good readers, noticed errors in the script and deviations from the lines by the actors and some even did some research on the controversy.

"We were quite astonished," Anderson said.

Laurie Leffler, a junior high literature teacher at Garfield Elementary School in Council Grove, said the show was well received among her students.

Leffler said she wasn't sure how many of her students would watch it, but estimated that 70 percent did. She said she expects an even higher turnout when the next film is shown.

The class did some of the activities in the teacher's manual and worked a lot with the vocabulary of the movie, she said. It was also used to get the students to become involved together.

Conley said that CBS produces about four of these programs a year, and WIBW decides if it is going to use it or not.

He said WIBW tries to pick shows which it believes have a good story line and enough excitement to keep the students' interest.

Conley said it's difficult for CBS to decide which movies it wants to do, as well as for WIBW to decide which ones it wants to use.

"What to participate in, what not to participate in — it's a tough judgment call," Conley said.

The station considers the program a service and shoulders the cost of scripts, guides and the shipping, Conley said.

The popularity of the program has doubled since it started at WIBW. Conley estimated that in the first year of the program they sent out 4,000 scripts. Last year they sent out over 8,000 scripts.

Some of the programs which have been produced under the reading program include episodes of M*A*S*H, mini-series such as "The Blue and The Gray" and movies.

Conley said that mini-series were particularly difficult to work with because it is hard for teachers and students to follow through on the program over an extended period of time.

Conley said the program changes the standpoint of television because students are now studying and reviewing it instead of just watching it.

"I think it makes them more critical of what they watch on television," he said. "It gets them to really experience television instead of just viewing it."

Open records ruling takes effect

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

A new, more liberal law concerning public access to open records, signed by Gov. John Carlin May 6, 1983, went into effect Jan. 1.

Kansas Attorney General Robert Stephan was instrumental in the passage of the bill. He began proposing legislation for the more liberal interpretation of the Open Records Act in 1979.

The old law stated that records which were required to be kept and maintained by law would be open to the public unless specifically closed by confidential or privacy clauses, said Neil Woerman, special assistant to the attorney general.

This meant it was an individual's responsibility to find a statute which required a record to be kept and maintained before the record could be reviewed, he said.

The major change is the philosophy behind the open records law. It is now presumed that a record is open unless specifically closed by law. This places the burden on the public agency to prove that a requested record falls under one of the 34 categories of exemptions, Woerman said.

Records fall into three categories, he said. They are either confidential or private; required to be disclosed to the public; or records an agency has the option to release or keep closed.

Other changes brought about by the new law include the provision that a public agency may require an advance fee for a public record. That fee may not, however, exceed the actual cost of access and furnishing copies.

The new law omits a former paragraph stating that any official who violates the provisions of the Open Records Act may be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to removal from office. Such an act is no longer a misdemeanor, but if access denial is not in good faith, district courts can award attorney fees.

It is now spelled out in the statute that the term "public record" means any recorded information, regardless of form or characteristics, which is made, maintained, kept or in the possession of any public agency.

This clarification in the new law is a result of a case that Stephan pursued to the Kansas Supreme Court in 1982. Woerman said. Kansas State ex rel Stephan v. Harder et al determined for the first time in Kansas that computer tapes are considered official public records. This case also determined that if a record contains an identifiable individual, but is otherwise subject to openness, the identification should be deleted and the statistical information released.

University Attorney Richard Seaton and Director of Communications Charles Hein compiled guidelines for the University to follow in complying with the new open records law.

Some of the exemptions to the law that pertain to students include viewing examination materials before tests are administered. Library patron and circulation records pertaining to identifiable individuals, medical or psychological records and personnel records are also on the list of exemptions, in addition to letters of reference or recommendation pertaining to character or qualifications of an identifiable individual.

David Adams, director of Student Publications, explained how the new open records will affect journalists.

"It (the new law) is another tool for our efforts to let the public know information on a variety of news stories apt to come up in the future," he said.

Interest in legal tax shelters rises

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The chief of the Internal Revenue Service says the number of people investing in tax shelters is growing because of increased incentives in the law, but interest in "abusive" shelters that cheat the government out of billions of dollars is on the wane.

IRS Commissioner Roscoe L. Egger Jr. said his agency's well-publicized campaign against abusive shelters is producing results. "Our impact is being felt" because fewer people are putting their money into investments that are designed more to create a tax benefit than a financial profit, he said.

"Abusive" shelters — those promising huge deductions at the start but offering little or no economic substance — are a prime target of the IRS. And it's not just because of the revenue lost; government officials fear a public perception that the rich are avoiding taxes through such transactions could destroy confidence in the tax system.

Among the most popular "abusive" shelters are those involving vastly overvalued art prints and master recordings, and partnership investments, financed by heavy borrowing, in ventures ranging from oil exploration to cattle feeding. It is not the type of investment but its structure and financing that determine whether it will meet approval of the IRS.

In a typical scheme, a tax-shelter promoter provides for an appraisal of an art work that is four or five times the selling price. The art is donated to a museum and the investor — who usually is in the 50 percent tax bracket — reaps a deduc-tion that in the first year more than returns the price of the art.

The IRS is now auditing 350,000 returns that include tax shelter investments. Armed with new laws, the agency is obtaining court injunctions to block clearly illegal schemes and notifying investors that if they claim deductions for abusive shelters, they will be audited.

But people are still interested in shielding their income from the tax collector.

"The growth has been in major areas of shelters that are consistent with the internal revenue laws," Egger said in an interview Monday. He attributed that growth to the 1981 Reagan tax cut that accelerated the rate at which certain investment expenses may be written off and that broadened use of the investment tax credit.

"Shelter" is not necessarily a dirty word, he said. The deduction for interest on a home mortgage is the most widely used shelter. Egger noted, adding that "it's now become so ingrained that people have come to think of it as a right."

On other tax matters, Egger said: — Work is under way to redraw the long Form 1040 — the one used by 61 percent of all Americans. Within three or four years, Egger said, the two-page 1040 might be fit onto a single sheet. This follows introduction of the ultra-simple 1040EZ form and the revamping of Form 1040A.

— The Reagan administration is considering ways to deal with elements of the "underground economy" — the collective term for people who work for cash or barter and thus are virtually outside the tax system. However, Egger said, "I'm much more concerned about the tax gap because the money is so much greater" than in the underground economy.

The tax gap is all the money the government loses to tax cheats, including the underground economy and those who overstate deductions, understate income, or have illegal earnings. The gap is estimated at about $82 billion a year, but only about 20 percent is due to the underground economy, Egger said.

Because of computerization and new laws requiring better reporting of such income as capital gains, interest and state tax refunds, he added, "we are well on the road to some pretty significant developments" that will reduce the tax gap.

— "There's still a major education program" needed to acquaint savers with the 1982 law aimed at halting tax cheating on interest and dividends. Banks and other financial institutions are flooding the mail with notices designed to see that savers provide their correct Social Security numbers for their accounts; that eventually will allow the IRS to check every interest-earned statement against a tax return. Savers who don't provide the number could have 20 percent of their interest and dividends withheld as advance tax payments.

— The IRS will not begin taxing employee fringe benefits before 1985, giving Congress another chance to settle the issue. But, Egger said, "it's almost impossible for a taxpayer to know what the rules are" because there is no law stating clearly which benefits should be taxed.

For several years, Congress barred the IRS from writing rules spelling out which benefits were taxable. Because of the absence of national rules, IRS officials in the field have been left to decide the question; as a result, a benefit that is taxable in one area might not be taxable in another.

Dole says hunger package lacks Capitol Hill support

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The chairman of a presidential task force said Tuesday the debate over hunger in America is far from over. Earlier, an influential Republican senator dashed hopes for the group's final report, saying it was unlikely to win congressional favor.

Speaking with reporters, J. Clayburn LaForce, chairman of the White House Task Force on Food Assistance, said argument over the extent of hunger will persist until an accurate measure is devised of how many people do not have enough food.

"Nobody's going to be able to give you a number," said LaForce, dean of the Graduate School of Management at UCLA.

On Monday, hours before the commission adopted its final report to the president, Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., said in a statement that Congress "is not likely to favor" the most far-reaching recommendation of the task force, which proposed that states have the option of running food assistance programs instead of the federal government.

State endorses bill to upgrade prisons

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Moving with uncharacteristic speed, the Senate's budget committee endorsed proposals Tuesday to provide $2.7 million for renovation projects to combat prison overcrowding.

The projects would create space for more than 300 minimum security inmates by July.

With its action, the Ways and Means Committee forwarded two bills to the full Senate, which is to debate and vote on them Wednesday afternoon. The measures were recommended by Gov. John Carlin as part of his legislative proposals for the 1984 session, and he has asked lawmakers to pass them by February.

"We have a problem. We all recognize we have a problem and we want to deal with it as quickly as we can in the session," said Sen. Paul Hess, R-Wichita and committee chairman.

One of the measures funds renovation projects for pre-release centers for 209 minimum security inmates in Topeka and Winfield and establishment of an outside dormitory for 127 inmates at the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

The second proposal authorizes creation of the pre-release centers, which will offer programs to prepare non-violent inmates for their return to society. They would enter the program about 90 days before their parole date.

Secretary of Corrections

Michael Barbara testified before the Ways and Means Committee, emphasizing that more space for inmates is needed before the summer heat to ensure that no prisoner uprisings occur. He noted that the prison population is nearing the maximum capacity of the corrections system or about 3,800.

"The time is very critical," said Barbara.

The Ways and Means Committee, which handles all budget measures, approved 11-0 the funding bill. It provides $1.5 million for renovation of vacant buildings at Topeka State Hospital and Winfield State Hospital and Training Center for the pre-release centers. The Topeka institution will house 65 inmates and the Winfield center will house 144 inmates. About $1.1 million will go for administration, equipment and salaries for workers at the pre-release centers.

A total of $153,000 was provided for renovation of a recreational building at the penitentiary so it can house 127 minimum security inmates in a fenced compound east of the main prison.

Combined, the three projects will require the addition of 119 staff members, ranging from administrators to security officers.

Finally, the funding measure provides $34,000 for architectural planning of renovation at Larned State Hospital for a project to add 80 more beds for the treatment of prison inmates with mental illness. Currently the institution can treat only about 30 inmates.

Reputed gangland figure dies in bomb blast

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Like three of his brothers before him, reputed underworld figure Carl Spero died in apparent gangland violence, a victim of a bomb that shattered his car and wheelchair, officials said.

Investigators who worked late into the night Monday determined "some type of explosive device" destroyed a shed used as an office at a used car lot and hurled Spero 20 feet through the air, according to Sgt. Jim Treece.

Spero, 44, who was a part owner or had some financial interest in the used car business, had been in the shed for about 15 or 20 minutes before the explosion, which was reported to police about 11:40 a.m., Treece said.

Spero, paralyzed in a 1979 gangland shooting, was found lying face down in the lot just east of downtown. The shattered remains of his wheelchair and a Cadillac bearing personalized license plates reading "Spero" were nearby.

At least four people, two customers and two employees, were on the used car lot when the blast shook the area. They were not hurt.

Affidavits filed by the U.S. Strike Force on Organized Crime identified Spero as a target of the Civella family, the reputed leaders of organized crime in Kansas City.

Spero, who lived in rural Holt,

Mo., had denied connections to organized crime, but law enforcement officials believed he had challenged the supremacy of the Civella organization.

In a conversation intercepted by the FBI during an investigation into casino skimming, Nick Civella and his brother, Carl, discussed how to kill Spero. They talked about how it would be difficult to kill Spero because of the remote area where he lived and because he would be on guard after the 1979 attack.

Local authorities had expressed fears that gangland violence would increase after Nick Civella died last March and Carl Civella and a top lieutenant, Carl DeLuna, entered prison on casino-skimming convictions.

Panel permits surgeons to implant heart device

By The Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — A university panel Tuesday approved guidelines permitting surgeons to implant the Utah artificial heart in a second human patient healthier than Barney Clark was and able to use a portable heart-drive system.

The University of Utah's Institutional Review Board, which twice had declined to approve more relaxed guidelines, opened its deliberations to allow reporters to view the vote.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration now has 30 days in which to approve the guidelines before surgeon William C. DeVries can implant the fist-sized device for a second time.

"This is just approval for one more case," said Dr. John Bosso, chairman of the 16-member board.

The 12 board members who voted decided unanimously to allow implantation of the heart in a patient whose natural heart stops on the operating table and cannot be restarted. The vote on whether to allow an implant in a patient with inoperable degenerative heart disease was 10-2 in favor.

Clark, the Seattle-area dentist who died March 23 after 112 days on the device, was suffering from inoperable cardiomyopathy of degenerative heart disease before the first implant of the Utah heart Dec. 2, 1982.

Clark, 62, was near death at the time of his implant and the advanced state of his disease may have caused damage to his other organs, doctors have said. Clark eventually succumbed to multiple organ failure.

Reagan speaks highly of U.S.-China relations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Tuesday the United States and China "stand on common ground" in the quest for peace and opposition to expansionism, but Premier Zhao Ziyang says the relationship "is far below the level it should have attained."

Zhao, the highest ranking official in the Chinese government and the first premier of that country ever to visit the United States, said there had been "ups and downs" in relations between Washington and Peking and that "difficulties and obstacles" still exist.

Reagan, welcoming Zhao to the White House for three days of talks, acknowledged "the differences between our two countries," but assured his guest that "we stand ready to nurture, develop and build upon the many areas of accord to strengthen the ties between us."

"We stand on common ground in opposing expansionism and interference in the affairs of independent states," Reagan said.

Both men referred to the foresight of those who opened the way to Sino-American rapprochement in 1972, when President Nixon made his historic visit to China after more than two decades of Sino-American estrangement.

Chinese Communist leader Deng Xiaoping marked the beginning of full diplomatic relations with a visit to Washington five years ago at the invitation of President Carter. Reagan plans to visit China in April.

Later, in post-luncheon toasts at the State Department, Secretary of State George P. Shultz told Zhao: "We've come a long way in this one year, Mr. Premier. We've resumed and advanced our strategic dialogue, which is so vital an element of our bilateral relations."

China has explored the possibility of buying U.S. anti-aircraft and anti-armor weapons systems, but a senior American official said last week he did not expect any major arms sales to China in the foreseeable future.

Zhao said his talks with Reagan and Shultz on Tuesday "showed that there are common points as well as differences between us. However, the important thing is the desire shared by both sides to develop our relations."

Shultz said economic ties between the two countries had become so complex and flourishing that problems had developed, but "we welcome the depth and breadth of our current relationship which makes such problems inevitable."

Shultz predicted that solutions would be found in the spirit of "a healthy and friendly interrelationship."

Reagan said the United States welcomes "the opportunity to walk at China's side" as the world's most populous nation embarks on an ambitious modernization program aimed at quadrupling its economic output by the year 2000.

Zhao, who's on a two-week, cross-country tour of the United States, noted that 1984 is the 200th anniversary of the first trade contacts between the United States and China.

Officer injured telling family of death

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A police officer who went to tell a family about a death in a traffic accident was beaten by two of the dead man's brothers, police said.

But family members of James Bauswell, who was struck and killed Friday, say it was the officer who started the fight.

Another officer who responded to a call for help for the officer was severely injured when his patrol car collided head-on with a car driven by a drunken driver, police spokesman Lt. Michael Dailey said Tuesday.

Bauswell, 26, was hitchhiking to his job at a pancake restaurant about 6:20 p.m. Friday when he was struck and killed by a car as he crossed the southbound lane of Interstate 29, the Missouri Highway Patrol said. The driver of the car was not charged.

Officer Eric Patton, 21, and a police chaplain were sent by Kansas City, Kan., police to tell Bauswell's family about his death, Dailey said.

Patton was sitting in his patrol car near the family home when Bauswell's brother, Mark, walked up to the car and began shouting obscenities, Dailey said.

"The officer got out of his car and tried to talk to him, but he began assaulting the officer," Dailey said.

Another brother, Shawn, 21, joined in the attack, Dailey said. Both Shawn and Mark Bauswell were charged with resisting arrest, assault and disorderly conduct, Dailey said.

The fight began before Patton could inform anyone in James Bauswell's family that he was dead, Dailey said.

Robert Bauswell Sr., the father of the brothers, said police had a longstanding feud with his sons. He said Mark Bauswell approached the car and asked Patton what he wanted, using a mild obscenity.

The officer got out of his car and struck Mark Bauswell on the leg with a nightstick, Robert Bauswell Sr. said.

The chaplain, whom police would not identify because he was a witness, called over the radio for help, Dailey said.

Officers arrived to arrest Mark and Shawn Bauswell.

Officer Joseph P. Ward also heard the call for help. He was driving to the scene when a car suddenly turned from a side street without its lights on and struck Ward's car head-on.

Four men in the car ran from the accident. The driver, Michael Harris, was arrested a short time later and charged with driving under the influence of alcohol, hit-and-run driving, driving a vehicle with switched license tags and driving left of center, Dailey said.

Ward was listed in good condition Tuesday. Patton remained on duty with contusions to the ribs.

Feds investigate legislator in Missouri capitol probe

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal source confirmed in Washington on Tuesday that the government is involved in a bribery investigation of a state legislator in Missouri.

"It's a very straightforward case. It involves only one guy," said the source, who spoke only on the condition that his identity not be released.

Federal officials in Kansas City have refused to comment on published reports of an investigation of the Missouri General Assembly.

The Washington source, however, said Tuesday that the federal probe involves one allegedly illicit transaction on tape involving influencing legislation and that there is only one potential defendant in the case. He said the case has not gone to a grand jury.

Missouri House Speaker Bob Griffin said last week that an investigation had started into possible wrongdoing in the General Assembly, but he said he could not disclose who or what was involved.

The Kansas City Times reported Friday that State Rep. Alex Fazzino, D-Kansas City, reportedly told six elected officials that he was in trouble with federal law enforcement officials.

Fight for Getty inheritance continues

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The descendants of J. Paul Getty inherited billions, and they're getting richer even as they battle over the future of the family oil company. If the current bid by Texaco Inc. to buy out Getty Oil is completed, the family's fortune will increase from $2.5 billion to $3.9 billion.

But the public battle over Getty Oil has divided the fiercely private family. It has also involved — and possibly dragged down — Getty Oil Chairman Sidney R. Petersen, a Getty career man who worked his way up the corporate ladder.

The Getty Museum of Malibu — controlling 11.8 percent of the oil company's stock — also has played a pivotal role, but it has steered clear of direct involvement in the struggle among the heirs.

J. Paul Getty built Getty Oil and ran it until his death in 1976.

Two of Getty's three surviving sons — Gordon and J. Paul Jr. — are locked in a legal battle for control of the Sarah C. Getty Trust, named for their grandmother.

The trust controls 40.2 percent of the company's 79.1 million shares, making it the most potent force in the direction of Getty Oil. And it stands to make an enormous amount of money if the Texaco takeover goes through. Late last year, Getty stock was selling for about $80 a share; Texaco is offering $125.

According to J. Paul Getty's will, the Sarah C. Getty Trust was to have three trustees — Gordon; family friend and attorney C. Lansing Hays and Security Pacific Bank — but Hays has died and Security Pacific refused to assume its role for what it called "legal, technical and business reasons."

Left in sole control, Gordon Getty pressed the company to pay higher dividends now. He has proposed establishing a royalty trust, under which income from oil properties would go directly to shareholders rather than being used to finance company diversification.

The company, Gordon's brother, J. Paul Getty Jr., and guardians of J. Paul Jr.'s daughter and heir, Tara Gabriel Galaxy Gramophone Getty, favored diversification, believing the long-term profits for the family would be greater.

A suit filed on behalf of Tara Getty seeks to end Gordon Getty's sole control over the trust, giving other heirs a voice in its operations.

The main players in the feud are:

— Gordon Peter Getty, 49, the youngest and reportedly least-favored of the five sons of J. Paul Getty. A musician and anthropologist who lives in San Francisco, he was listed last year by Fortune magazine as the wealthiest individual in the United States by virtue of his sole control of the trust.

He was named a trustee of the family estate only after one brother, George Franklin Getty II, died and the two surviving brothers fell from favor.

— J. Paul Getty Jr., 52, was born Eugene Paul Getty but later changed his name. He had been designated overseer of the trust, but was stripped of that role by his father after a scandal rocked his family.

J. Paul Getty Jr. disappeared from public view in 1971 after his Dutch-born wife, actress Talitha Pol, died of an apparent heroin overdose. He still lives in seclusion, part of the time in a London townhouse protected by a sophisticated closed-circuit television security system.

— Jean Ronald Getty, 53, is the oldest of the surviving sons. However, he has little stake in the struggles. He was virtually written out of his father's will — receiving only about $3,000 a year — reportedly because J. Paul Getty was bitter over an expensive divorce settlement extracted by his third wife, Jean's mother.

Dividends from the trust are split into three shares of about $28 million a year — more than $76,000 a day — which go to Gordon, J. Paul Jr. and the three daughters of their deceased brother, George, whose death in 1973 at age 48 was ruled a "probable suicide" from a lethal mixture of drugs and alcohol.

The fifth son of J. Paul Getty, Timothy, was the favorite. But he was a frail and sickly child who died in 1958 at age 12.

— Sidney R. Petersen, Getty Oil's chairman and chief executive, joined a Getty subsidiary, Tidewater Oil, in 1955, two years after graduating from the University of California at Berkeley with a bachelor's degree in business administration. He rose steadily. But since becoming Getty chairman in 1980, he has sparred constantly with Gordon Getty over the company's direction.

Petersen's doom appeared sealed last week when a tentative agreement was reached in which Gordon Getty, through the Trust, and Houston-based Pennzoil would have bought up all the company's outstanding stock. Petersen would have been ousted after the takeover.

However, Texaco Inc. made an even richer offer to buy out all Getty shareholders, including the Trust and the museum.

"Texaco has not announced what its plans are" involving Petersen and other Getty managers, said Getty spokesman Jack Leone.

— Harold W. Williams, chairman of a philanthropic trust that supports the wealthy J. Paul Getty Museum, has played a pivotal role in the corporate battles. The museum, with its extensive stock holdings, is the company's second-largest shareholder and was able to provide crucial swing votes.

The museum, already the richest in the nation, has emerged as a major winner from the corporate takeover war. At the price being offered by Texaco, the museum will be able to cash out its shares for $1.2 billion, bringing its total assets to $2.1 billion.

Judge disallows jurors to hear tape at Craft retrial

By The Associated Press

JOPLIN, Mo. — The judge hearing former TV anchorwoman Christine Craft's fraud retrial refused Tuesday to allow the playing of a tape in which members of a viewer panel were asked by a researcher if they thought Craft was "a nut."

U.S. District Judge Joseph E. Stevens Jr. denied a request by attorney Dennis E. Egan to play the tape to jurors hearing Craft's $3.5 million suit against Metromedia Inc., former owner of KMBC-TV in Kansas City.

Craft's attorneys then rested their case after reading from a deposition given by Ridge Shannon, the former KMBC-TV news director.

The Metromedia attorney, Donald W. Giffin, asked for a directed verdict, saying Craft had failed to prove her case or to present adequate testimony to warrant it going to the jury.

Stevens denied the request, and Giffin began presenting his evidence.

In the tape, Steve Meacham, a former employee of Audience Research and Development of Dallas, asked members of a focus group — a cross-section of viewers brought together to discuss local newscasters — in May 1981 their opinions of Kansas City's news anchors.

The tape was played last summer during the first trial of Craft's lawsuit. Meacham was criticized at that trial by a media specialist for his leading remarks during the focus group session.

The jury in the earlier trial awarded Craft $500,000 on her fraud claim, but Stevens threw out the award and ordered a new trial in Joplin, about 150 miles south of Kansas City, saying the award was excessive and the jury might have been influenced by media coverage.

Craft, 39, contends that KMBC-TV management reneged on a promise that her appearance would not be changed if she accepted the co-anchor position. She testified last week that soon after she started at KMBC in January 1981, consultants were brought in to make major modifications in her makeup and wardrobe. She testified that when she was demoted in August 1981 she was told that viewers found her "too old and too unattractive."

KMBC General Manager R. Kent Repleg testified last week that Craft's demotion from the KMBC anchor desk was due in large part to audience research — including the focus group findings — that indicated viewers did not like her appearance.

The judge and attorneys on both sides spent most of Tuesday morning and early afternoon in chambers, discussing whether the focus group tape would be played and what prior trial and deposition testimony from Meacham and Ed Bewley, an executive at Audience Research, would be allowed.

In testimony from Bewley, he said focus groups are a widely used method of discussing with viewers at length "their feelings and concerns" about television personalities. He said they were followed by telephone surveys in which more specific questions were asked.

Previous testimony from Jan Kimbrough, former co-host of KMBC's PM Magazine, also was read at the trial Tuesday. She described a discussion with Craft about the changes in her appearance.

GM combines divisions; models to remain same

By The Associated Press

WARREN, Mich. — General Motors Corp. will combine its five car divisions into two self-contained business groups — one for large cars and one for small — the nation's largest automaker announced Tuesday.

Each group will be totally responsible for the cars it builds, including engineering, manufacturing, assembly and marketing, the company said at a news conference at GM's technical center in the Detroit suburb of Warren.

Along with structural changes, the groups will report to a newly elected executive vice president in charge of North American passenger car operations.

Alexander A. Cunningham was named to the new position and elected to GM's board of directors Monday in New York City. Cunningham was vice president in charge of GM's body and assembly group.

GM said Lloyd E. Reuss, 47, now general manager of the Buick division, will head the small car group, which includes the Chevrolet, Pontiac and GM of Canada divisions.

Robert C. Stempel, 50, general manager of the Chevrolet Motor Division, will be in charge of the Buick-Oldsmobile-Cadillac group.

The five car divisions will retain their current product lines and dealer organizations.

AT&T breakup causes national concern; Manhattan to feel little immediate effect

By LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

Possible effects of the much publicized American Telephone & Telegraph Co. break up have caused nationwide concern. Manhattan residents, however, will see few immediate changes.

The AT&T break up was completed Jan. 1. Since then, local service in the Manhattan area has been handled by Southwestern Bell Telephone Co.

Sharon Mayo, a Southwestern Bell representative, said customers will no longer be renting equipment from local phone companies.

"Southwestern Bell now only handles local service," Mayo said. "AT&T will handle equipment that has already been leased."

New phone customers will have to lease or purchase their own equipment.

Phone service for current customers will not change.

"Current customers will see no difference unless they want to change something, like buying phones or choosing a different long distance company," she said. "On their bill, there will be more numbers listed to call for service."

Customers will receive a combined bill from AT&T and the local phone company until August.

"The bill will indicate which calls were through the local phone company and which were through AT&T," she said.

Although most long distance calls will be made through AT&T, some will be within the service boundaries of Southwestern Bell.

"Southwestern Bell will handle long distance calls if they are within our boundaries," Mayo said. "For instance, if someone in Manhattan were to call Topeka, we (Southwestern Bell) would handle it. If the call were to Wichita, it would cross our boundary and be on AT&T."

Rita Daniels, a Southwestern Bell representative, said there has been a rate increase since the break up.

"Customers will be charged an additional $1.35 per month for the line," Daniels said. "Most customers will not be charged for local calls. There is an option to pay for local calls. It can save money for people who do not use their phone much."

Residence hall phone rates will not increase this semester, despite the cost increase. Thomas Frith, director of housing, said rates will probably increase next year.

Rift forms between Carlin, K-NEA

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Relations have soured between Gov. John Carlin and Kansas-National Education Association, the state's largest teachers union.

Both sides confirmed Tuesday that a rift developed last week when Carlin refused a K-NEA appeal for him to enhance his educational proposals and to put more than the $54 million of new money into elementary and secondary education which he proposed to the Legislature.

The spat worsened Monday when Carlin pulled out of a scheduled speaking engagement before the western regional conference of NEA in Phoenix Friday night — after K-NEA had told the governor it was "reassessing" whether it wanted him to speak.

Nancy Lindberg of Lyons, K-NEA president, confirmed the split between the organization and the governor and said it will be difficult to repair.

"We were not sure we wanted to proclaim him the friend of education that we had in the past," she said in an interview with Radio Station KANU in Lawrence.

The dispute arose when Carlin informed K-NEA about two weeks ago that he was not proposing putting as much money into public education as the teachers' organization wanted.

Lindberg and K-NEA staff officials called a news conference last week to criticize Carlin's proposal. They proposed a one-cent increase in the state's 3 percent sales tax to generate an estimated $70 million more for increasing teachers' salaries.

Carlin called that proposal impractical in an election year and in the wake of $200 million worth of tax increases enacted in 1983.

After the disagreement over the governor's education recommendations, Carlin's staff called K-NEA headquarters Monday to see if there were any changes in plans for Carlin to address the Phoenix conference, said Carlin's press secretary, Mike Swenson.

"They said they were reassessing to see whether they still wanted the governor," Swenson added. "The governor then decided he didn't need to go. He just determined there was no need to wait 24 hours to make a decision."

Lindberg said Carlin was invited because he was one of four governors "that was a friend of education, and yet that individual (Carlin) was not taking the strides forward that a lot of the other governors were doing."

While K-NEA was still reassessing, Carlin decided not to go and K-NEA promptly withdrew its invitation.

Bill may raise school attendance age

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A bill to require Kansas students to attend school until age 18, raising the compulsory attendance age from 16, was introduced Tuesday in the Senate.

Democratic Sens. Billy McCray of Wichita and Frank Gaines of Augusta were the sponsors of the legislation, which was one of two bills introduced during a brief Senate session.

"Presently there is no emphasis on keeping youth in school," said McCray.

The measure would require Kansas youth to attend school until they reach the age of 18 or successfully graduate from high school. Currently, students are required to attend school only until age 16.

Gaines said the measure would be "very controversial," and noted that one out of five Kansas students now fails to graduate from high school.

Also introduced in the Senate was a measure to make future water rights subject to minimum streamflow requirements. The Legislature is expected this session to enact legislation to establish standards for minimum levels in some streams and rivers.

In the House, only one measure was introduced. It would exempt farmers from paying annual registration fees for three-wheeled all-terrain vehicles used exclusively for agricultural purposes.

Central America panel seeks broad reform

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Kissinger Commission on Central America, warning of a direct Soviet-Cuban threat to American security interests, called Wednesday for broad-based political, economic and social reform in the region, backed by a 5-year, $8 billion economic aid program and increased military assistance.

The panel's report, submitted to President Reagan, endorses the main outlines of administration policy toward Central America but says U.S. objectives cannot be achieved without intensified efforts.

The panel, known as the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, was formed by Reagan with a mandate to make policy recommendations with wide public and congressional support. Reagan has said he will weigh the study's proposals with an open mind.

Reagan congratulated the commission for producing what he called "the most comprehensive and detailed review" he had ever seen of the issues affecting U.S. national security in the troubled region.

In tone and substance, the report appears in large measure to reflect the views of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the commission chairman. On the panel was an ideologically diverse group, ranging from former Republican Gov. William Clements of Texas to San Antonio's Democratic mayor, Henry Cisneros.

The report said the establishment of Soviet-bloc regimes in Central America would be a Soviet "strategic coup" and would require the United States to devote "large resources" to defend the Caribbean area, thus reducing U.S. capacity to defend its interests elsewhere.

It would pose a potentially serious threat to American shipping lanes in the Caribbean and would "increase violence, dislocation, and political repression in the region," the report says.

A Marxist-dominated Central America also could lead to millions of refugees, many of whom would seek entry into the United States and it would convince allies elsewhere that the United States is unable to influence vital events close to home, the study says.

Thus, the report concludes, the "concerting of the power of the Soviet Union and Cuba to extend their presence and influence into vulnerable areas of the Western Hemisphere is a direct threat to U.S. security interests. This type of insurgency is present in Central America today." The report also describes Nicaragua's leftist government as a "continuing threat to stability in the region."

On El Salvador, it states flatly that the civil war there "is at a stalemate — a condition that in the long run favors the guerrillas." To break the impasse, the commission recommends an immediate "substantial" aid increase without giving specific figures.

The study says Congress should require periodic reports conditioning future military aid for El Salvador to progress in several areas, including a termination of rightist death squad activities.

The report also tacitly criticizes the military aid cuts imposed by the Congress. It also:

— Recommends a supplemental aid appropriation of $400 million and a doubling of current economic assistance levels thereafter.

— Says the panel did not attempt to come to a collective judgment on whether, and how, the United States should support Nicaraguan rebels fighting the Sandinista government. It adds, however, that a panel majority believed that the efforts of the insurgents represent "one of the incentives working in favor of a negotiated settlement."

Bicyclist suffers accident injuries

A bicyclist was injured Wednesday afternoon in an accident with an automobile at the intersection between Holton and Bluemont Halls.

Karen Butler, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, was taken to Lafene Student Health Center shortly after the accident and remained there overnight. A spokesman at Lafene declined to comment about the extent of her injuries.

According to K-State police, the accident occurred at about 3:45 p.m. Police Sgt. Reese Jackson and Corp. Jim Williamson reported to the scene within a few minutes of receiving the accident call. An ambulance was also called.

The officers said they had not determined the cause of the accident and declined to speculate about it until further investigation. They would not release the name of the driver until a release had been granted. No citations were issued to either Butler or the driver.

Karen Butler, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, is attended to by paramedics after she was struck by an automobile while riding her bicycle in front of Bluemont Hall Wednesday afternoon. Butler was taken to Lafene Student Health Center where she is being treated for injuries sustained in the accident. The extent of her injuries is unknown.

Helicopter pilot shot, killed after landing in Honduras

By The Associated Press

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras — "Hostile fire" from Nicaragua killed the American pilot of a U.S. Army observation helicopter that made a forced landing Wednesday on a road in a tense border area of Honduras, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said.

The spokesman, Chris Arcos, said two Army engineers traveling in the OH-58 helicopter were taken immediately to the U.S. military hospital at Palmerola Air Base north of the Honduran capital. The Pentagon in Washington said the two men escaped injury and were released after being examined. None of the men's identities were released.

"There were only three people on board the craft," Arcos said. "The pilot was mortally wounded after the helicopter was obliged to land. The hostile fire came from Nicaragua."

The helicopter and its crew were part of joint U.S.-Honduran military exercises, dubbed Big Pine II, that began last August and involved as many as 5,000 American troops at one time. It was the first reported shooting episode involving the U.S. forces in the maneuvers.

Government sources in Washington said one of the engineer passengers from the helicopter told a U.S. Embassy official in Tegucigalpa that the helicopter was involved in exercises to enlarge airstrips in eastern Honduras and was "blown off course" in a windstorm that pushed the aircraft close to the Nicaraguan border. The sources spoke on condition they not be identified.

One source in Washington said the helicopter was attacked near Cifuentes, a town near the Nicaraguan border and in the area where CIA-backed Nicaraguan rebels have launched attacks against the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

Neither Arcos nor Pentagon spokesmen specified what had forced the plane to land or the nature of the "hostile fire." Lt. Col. Tom Jones at the Pentagon said U.S. commanders in Honduras would investigate to determine the exact circumstances of the incident.

In Managua, the Nicaraguan capital, Sandinista spokesmen had no immediate comment.

A policeman in Ocotal, about 150 miles north of Managua and near the border, told The Associated Press by telephone that the helicopter had entered Nicaraguan air space "close to Escambray (a village near the border town of Jalapa) and was fired upon." The policeman, who refused to be identified, said he did not know who did the shooting.

Measure to fight crowding

Lawmakers pass prison bills

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Acting on its first major legislation of the session, the Kansas Senate unanimously passed a $2.7 million package Wednesday to reduce prison overcrowding by providing space for more than 300 minimum-security inmates by next summer.

On 40-0 roll call votes, the Senate passed two bills which made up the corrections package and forwarded them to the House, where floor action is expected next week.

One of the bills finances the establishment of pre-release centers for 209 minimum security inmates in Topeka and Winfield, and an outside dormitory to house 127 inmates at the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

The second measure authorizes the pre-release programs, which are to help inmates prepare to return to their communities. Courses on finding jobs and other counseling will be provided. No such programs are now offered, and the pre-release centers will be open only to non-violent inmates who are about 90 days from their parole date.

"These two bills pertain to the quiet crisis we have concerning our prison population," said Sen. Paul Hess, R-Wichita and budget committee chairman, as he explained the proposals during brief floor debate.

Gov. John Carlin, who recommended the proposals in his budget message to the Legislature on Tuesday, referred to prison overcrowding in his speech as one of several "quiet crises" facing Kansas. The governor asked lawmakers to pass the prison package by February so the projects can be completed by July.

Under the Department of Corrections plan, vacant buildings at Topeka State Hospital and the Winfield State Hospital and Training Center will be renovated to establish the pre-release centers. Officials say renovation of existing state buildings is the quickest and least expensive way to make extra space available in the prison system. The Winfield center will house 144 inmates and about 65 will be at the Topeka institution.

Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara has repeatedly warned lawmakers the prison population is nearing the maximum capacity of existing institutions and said the overcrowding must be relieved before the summer heat or there could be inmate uprisings.

The funding bill provides $1.5 million for renovation needed to establish the pre-release centers and $1.1 million for administration, equipment and worker salaries at the two institutions.

About $153,000 is provided for renovation to convert a recreational building at the penitentiary into a 127-bed dormitory in a fenced compound east of the prison.

Finally, the measure provides $34,000 for architectural planning of renovation of buildings at Larned State Hospital for the addition of 80 beds for the treatment of inmates with mental illness. Currently, the hospital can treat only about 30 inmates. A bill providing nearly $350,000 for the renovation at Larned will be discussed later in the session.

The second bill, which enables the Corrections Department to establish pre-release programs, passed with two provisions restricting the operation of the institutions. The provisions were included to placate Winfield residents who objected to the pre-release center in their community.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee removed the two limitations Tuesday when it endorsed the measures, but reversed its action at a meeting before the floor debate Wednesday.

One of the provisions limits to 15 the number of inmates who could be kept at the pre-release center as maintenance and support staff, such as kitchen help. The inmate staff would not be participants in the pre-release program.

The other limitation precludes the future use of the Winfield State Hospital as a work release center or honor camp by the Department of Corrections.

Court upholds Silkwood verdict

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Wednesday reinstated a $10 million negligence award won by the three children of the late Karen Silkwood, whose name became a battle cry for nuclear industry critics.

By a 5-4 vote, the nation's highest court ruled that the huge "punitive damages" award against Kerr-McGee Corp. does not interfere with federal regulation of the nuclear industry.

The decision, however, leaves Kerr-McGee free to challenge, in whole or in part, the award made by an Oklahoma jury in 1979. The jury found that Kerr-McGee's negligence led to Silkwood's radioactive contamination.

"Wonderful news," said Silkwood's mother, Merle Silkwood of Nederland, Texas, who wept after learning of Wednesday's decision. "We've got everything we wanted."

Bill Silkwood, Silkwood's father, said he hoped the decision will have an impact on the nuclear industry.

"It sends a message to big companies that they ought to look at how their plants are run like Karen was trying to do here — to get better health and safety measures," he said.

In Oklahoma City, family lawyer James Ikard predicted that the legal dispute could last up to three years longer if Kerr-McGee decides to continue attacking the award. "We are very happy. We just don't know how happy," he said.

There was no immediate reaction from Kerr-McGee, except that spokeswoman Donna McFarland said the Oklahoma City-based corporation was "surprised" by the ruling.

Speaking at a news conference several hours after the high court's decision was announced, Kerr-McGee attorney Bill Paul said the company "most assuredly will challenge" the jury award.

Paul also said a federal appeals court must still decide on radiation and protection standards that would apply to the entire industry.

If the award eventually is upheld it will make millions of dollars of Kerr-McGee's three teen-aged children who live in Ardmore, Okla., with their father, William Meadows.

Meadows had been divorced from Silkwood when she died in a 1974 automobile crash.

Silkwood, a 28-year-old laboratory analyst at Kerr-McGee's Cimarron plutonium plant near Crescent, Okla., died Nov. 13, 1974, while on her way to meet with a reporter from The New York Times. Nine days before, she had been radioactively contaminated.

Deputy secretary tells committee Marines should remain in Beirut

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam, declaring that "now is not the time to flinch," told a Senate committee Wednesday that U.S. policy in the Middle East hinges on keeping 1,800 Marines in Lebanon.

If Congress or further terrorist attacks force a pullout of American troops from Beirut, Dam said, "the result will be that the United States would be back to ground zero in its Middle East policy."

Dam testified before the Republican-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee, whose members are increasingly uneasy about the continued presence of U.S. troops in Beirut after the bombing of Marine headquarters near Beirut International Airport.

Sen. Charles Percy, R-Ill., the committee chairman, called the hearing on President Reagan's policy in Lebanon in advance of Congress' return Jan. 23 from a two-month recess. A major congressional battle over Lebanon — and whether to shorten the Marines' authorized stay there — is expected when the recess ends.

Dam said a U.S. withdrawal from the multinational peacekeeping force in Beirut would ruin the chances that Syria might be willing to negotiate a peaceful settlement among warring factions in Lebanon.

Longtime K-Stater to retire

When K-State was still called Kansas State College and the first men's residence hall was built in 1956, Daniel Beatty was hired as vice-president of business affairs.

After 28 years in that position, Beatty is retiring effective March 1, 1984.

Beatty said some of the notable events which have occurred during his more than 20 years here include increases in enrollment, campus-wide expansion, and "the continuous growth in all areas; the students, teachers, research and the cooperative extension program."

Beatty said the most significant change in education overall has been the "increased involvement by the federal government starting around the time Sputnik was launched."

Support for war veterans, defense research, graduate fellowships, education grants and loans were begun by the federal government and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to increase students' and teachers' knowledge in these areas, he explained.

Beatty said he didn't know what he plans to do after retiring. He said he would like to teach again. Beatty taught accounting and business in the early 1950s at William Jewell College in Liberty, Mo.

He received his bachelor's degree from Hope College in Holland, Mich., and his master's degree from the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, Mich.

Electronic message boards among Union improvements

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Administrators spent the Christmas break preparing for additions to be made in the Union.

Two electronic message centers have been installed, but they are not yet functioning. Problems with the message centers need to be worked out before they can begin operation.

The message centers are large boards about 48 inches wide which carry electronic messages.

Walt Smith, Union director, said the boards will deliver all up-to-date news, sports and weather.

There is no particular reason for the addition of the boards to the Union, he said, other than being a fun item that might appeal to students.

"It is just a service that we kind of thought the students would enjoy," Smith said.

The project is not intended to produce a profit of any kind, nor is it an additional cost to Union customers.

The Union is also planning to redesign the information desk area on the ground floor, either in the summer of 1984 or 1985.

Better use of existing space and expansion of services are the reasons for these changes, Smith said.

Other possible additions include the area north of the information desk opening out onto a patio and the addition of an ice-cream shop.

The cost of the renovation has already been budgeted so student and user fees will not increase, Smith said.

He said three or four new employment positions may be created as a result of the project, but this will be determined by the amount of business conducted after its completion.

Three architecture and design classes developed plans for the project and presented layouts of their ideas to the Union. Smith said student involvement is often utilized in making changes and additions to the Union.

The Union has also distributed a user-satisfaction survey among a random selection of students, faculty and Manhattan residents.

The survey was developed by the Union Governing Board, a group of students who set Union policies. Faculty advisers and Union administrators also serve on the board.

A UGB committee developed the survey by comparing surveys from other universities and receiving ideas from Educational Services.

"In reality, we want something from the students and faculty as to what they would like — what kind of job we're doing," Smith said.

Questions on the survey include those asking patron response to Union employees' service and whether patrons believe the Union is providing adequate services.

Jack Connaughton, Union assistant director, said the random selection of survey recipients was done by the computer center at Fairchild Hall. He said approximately 900 students, 150 classified persons (those who use the Union but are not students or faculty/staff) and from 250 to 300 faculty received the survey.

The survey results are not complete, but Connaughton said a 50 to 60 percent return is expected. He said a return percentage of this amount would be considered a good return, adding that return rates must be high in order for the survey to be valid.

Smith said the survey will be used as part of the Union's evaluation, and if the survey shows that changes need to be made, action will be taken accordingly.

Cold fails to deter renovation

On Dec. 13, 1968, Nichols Gymnasium was gutted by a late-night fire, but renovation is now breathing life into the skeletal remains of the structure.

After approval by the Kansas Legislature last spring of appropriations for the $6.2 million project, the long-awaited renovation began.

Renovation of Nichols began last fall, said Vince Cool, associate director of facilities for University Facilities. Despite the onslaught of freezing weather last month, work has continued as scheduled.

"It's been awful darn cold. It's gone slow. It (the weather) never did stop it (work on Nichols), but it sure put a crimp in it," he said.

Construction workers are now working on the interior of the building, protected from the elements by heated, enclosed areas. Cool said. Currently, the interior structural framework is under renovation.

Although construction began only a few months ago, workers have finished removing damaged masonry, which is being replaced on the south and west ends of the building. Reinforcements which were under the old gymnasium have been removed, and foundations and interior plastering are almost complete, Cool said.

The renovation of Nichols is to be completed, as planned, for the fall semester of 1985, Cool said.

The building, which once housed a gym, swimming pools and KSDB and KSAC radio stations, will accommodate the speech and computer science departments. Plans for the newly renovated building include a small theater to replace the Purple Masque, offices, labs and classrooms. Storage also will be available in the basement of the building for Farrell Library.

Kansas natural gas production increases

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A significant increase in the production of Kansas natural gas occurred in the past six months, Phil Dick, a member of the Kansas Corporation Commission said Wednesday, which could signal a "major turn-about in production" for the next several years.

Dick told the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee the increased production was not due simply to recent cold weather. Instead, he attributed the change to "a major shift and restructuring of the market."

"It's a very positive development," Dick told lawmakers. "Producers are being forced to use cheaper gas. They are losing their markets because their price is too high to compete. I see it as a restructuring of the market and not just a shift in demand."

The commissioner was called before the committee to review the KCC's activities during the interim and update lawmakers on issues relating to the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant under construction near Burlington and natural gas topics in Kansas and before the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in Washington D.C.

He said a glut in the natural gas market was driving prices down and forcing pipeline companies to mix cheap gas with higher priced gas, especially in the industrial market. In recent years, Kansas legislators have been concerned about dropping production of natural gas and searched for ways to force the use of the gas.

"They are using Kansas gas simply because it's cheaper," Dick said. "It's a very, very significant shift and I'd classify it as a major change, certainly not a one or two year change."

Natural gas production in Kansas has dropped steadily since 1978 when 861 million units of gas were produced. In 1982, about 433 million units of gas were produced — about the same total for 1983 gas production. One unit of gas equals 1,000 cubic feet and the average household uses 10 units of gas per month except in extremely cold months when consumption doubles.

In fact, in each of the last seven months of 1983, gas production was ahead of the pace from the same month in 1982. And in the massive Hugoton field in southwest Kansas, natural gas production soared in May, when compared to the previous year. For the year, the total production from the Hugoton field is projected to be 16 million units ahead of 1982.

City turns pavillion into ice skating rink

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

In the summer, City Park Pavilion is a place for picnics and enjoying the outdoors.

But on Dec. 21, the pavillion was transformed into the city's first ice skating rink, complete with concession stand and spectator seats.

"It looks like a cafe," said Mike Buchanan, operations manager for the rink. "That's what we're trying to make it look like."

Since its opening, the rink has attracted up to 30 skaters each session, Buchanan said. Sessions are one hour and 45 minutes long and last from 4 to 8 p.m. on weekdays and 1 to 9 p.m. on weekends.

The $46,000 portable rink can be operated even when the temperature rises above freezing, Buchanan said. The rink is cleared between sessions so some of the six workers assigned to the facility can maintain the ice, he said.

Buchanan said the rink has been well received by the public.

"It seems like people are just learning about it," Buchanan said. "It's not big, but it is good, smooth ice."

The 40- by 60-foot rink may soon be used for figure skating, broom ball and hockey lessons, but is too small for hockey games, Buchanan said. Fifty people can use the rink at one time.

In past winters, the city has flooded an area of the park across from City Hall to be used for skating, Buchanan said. Last winter, the area was suitable for skating for only six days, he said.

"We're planning on going until spring break or longer if the weather permits," Buchanan said. Although the rink has refrigeration units to produce ice, the cost of operation becomes prohibitive as the temperature rises, he said.

The city is working with the Manhattan Optimist Club to obtain skates for loan to rink users. Although some skates are available at the facility, more are needed, he said.

Anyone wishing to donate skates may contact the rink or Clyde Scott, a member of the club, at 776-6612.

Private skating sessions are available by contacting Buchanan at the city Parks and Recreation Department.

Glickman proposes changes in farm programs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — U.S. Rep. Dan Glickman told Kansas lawmakers today the federal government should limit the number of bushels farmers can produce to participate in federal farm programs instead of restricting acreage.

"We spent billions of taxpayers' dollars in a vain attempt to control production by dropping the number of acres in production," Glickman told a joint meeting of the Kansas House and Senate Agriculture committees. "Now is the time to implement a bushel allotment system; the present acreage-based policies are an utter failure."

Glickman, D-Kan., said even though the federal farm budget has increased faster than the defense budget, net farm income has slumped. He blamed that slump in part on "the staggering burden on the market caused by huge oversupplies of grain."

The federal government's present limitation on acreage in the payment-in-kind program has not successfully limited grain supplies, Glickman said. Instead, he said, it "has encouraged overuse of fertilizers and pesticides to get production up."

Glickman was to talk about the proposed limitation on bushels in a speech to the annual meeting of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture after appearing at the joint committee meeting.

Glickman said President Reagan and Congress will probably not change PIK wheat program guidelines in time to make the program more economically attractive during 1984. Sign-up for the 1984 federal wheat program begins Monday.

But the federal government may act, Glickman said, if present guidelines, which provide less financial incentive to set aside more acres than in 1983, result in "participation that is so low that it will embarrass the administration."

Glickman predicted legislation to reduce the $200 billion federal deficit would take priority over any major farm legislation in 1984.

Congress could reduce the deficit by $15 billion this year, he said, if it passed legislation by Easter to raise taxes and reduce defense spending, the growth in the Medicare budget and cost-of-living adjustments in Social Security.

But he said interest rates, which greatly determine a farmer's cost of doing business, would increase to 20 percent next year if Congress took no action on the deficit.

Glickman said Americans would not stand for sizeable cuts in Medicare, Social Security and other benefit programs.

"Responsible tax policy is going to be key to keeping interest rates down," he said. "But people don't seem to like paying income tax anymore. Should we go to a flat tax or a national sales tax?"

Glickman said farm groups with opposing goals share with the federal government the responsibility for the failure of federal farm programs.

Except for some tinkering with price support and loan rates, Glickman said, current farm programs have not changed since their creation in the late 1930s.

University should mail grades

Taxpayers like to hear government leaders talk about fiscal restraint. Students may like to hear administrators talk about cutting waste out of the University's budget.

For taxpayers, sound budget management means fewer taxes. For students, it can mean fewer tuition increases.

But the administration has gone too far in one area in its quest to hold the line on spending: the holding of grades until fee payment and registration.

It would seem that the University would be happy to reward students for a job well done, or even to inform them that they need to do better, before the hectic enrollment period.

Since the policy of not mailing grades began after spring semester 1982, students have been left guessing what grades they earned while the sense of academic achievement has been lost in the shuffle.

Before the administration took this action, it would have been wise to consider the ramifications.

The policy indicates that the powers that be have chosen to take the emphasis off academic prowess. Down the river at the University of Kansas, students still receive grades in the mail. This sad comparison may indicate where the schools' priorities are.

Only a minimal amount — about $3,600 — is saved by this practice.

Officials must also remember that students are not only paying tuition but also living expenses, and hope to have something resembling a social life with the cash left over. It is somewhat of an insult for students to pump thousands of dollars into the University, only to contend with delayed grades from a spendthrift administration.

There is no easy solution to the state's financial problems, and the same goes for regents institutions. Tearing away at an already-eroding academic base, however, is not the answer.

Instead of letting everyone in the state think "A Nation At Risk," that ominous 1983 government report that warned of problems with education in the United States, is gospel, other spending cuts should be made in areas of true waste.

If administrators are looking to trim $3,600 from the budget, they need look no farther than their paychecks. And there ought to be plenty of fat to cut there.

Hafez Assad's political motives

The Rev. Jesse Jackson made headlines New Year's weekend as he successfully secured the release from Syria of Navy pilot Robert O. Goodman Jr. Videotape of Jackson triumphantly lifting Goodman's hand in the air could be seen on every television newscast. And since then, the Democratic presidential candidate's campaign has experienced a surge of interest and support.

Politically this was a major victory for Jackson. No longer will his name be lost among the eight Democratic contenders for the Oval Office, and his Syrian negotiations have garnered congratulations from his opponents.

Jackson may have foreseen just such a success, but another participant in the agreement appears to have skillfully used the situation to his advantage.

Syrian President Hafez Assad would like to make Syria the dominant country amid the conflict in the Middle East. He would like to be the negotiator in an Israeli-Arab peace settlement and envisions the Persian Gulf under Syrian control. He resents American involvement in the region and as a result, with the help of Soviet hardware, has made Syria a military force to be reckoned with.

In negotiating with Jackson for Goodman's release, Assad has ridiculed President Reagan in an underhanded way. Jackson took advantage of a politically promising situation to generate interest in his candidacy and demonstrate his appeal for peace in the region. But Assad recognized in Jackson's mission the political prospects of retribution directed at Reagan. By playing to Jackson's interests, Assad reprimanded Reagan for his Middle East involvement by undermining the president's political clout at a crucial time — election year.

Assad also recognized a golden opportunity to improve his image. Although after overtaking the Syrian government in 1970, he brought political stability to an area historically rife with conflict, his authoritarian regime has been known to be bloody and harsh. Excessive killings of prisoners have been reported, and a 1983 report by a London human rights group detailed imprisonment of civilians without charge — as well as 23 forms of torture.

Assad apparently used Jackson's mission in an attempt to sway American opinion of himself and his country. To an uninformed public, Assad's act of humanitarianism may have appeared to be cooperation in the Christmas spirit between Jackson and the Syrian government. But an awareness of Syria's attempt at power in the Middle East allows an accurate reflection of Assad's actual intentions to appear.

Assad is determined to make Syria the foremost political power in the Middle East and obviously saw Jackson's trip as a prime opportunity to further his cause not only in attempting to change attitudes about his country but in embarrassing Reagan as well.

On Christianity and nuclear arms

Many people agree that the most important issue facing us today is the nuclear arms race: whether we can or cannot avoid destroying the world in a nuclear adventure. However, there is a large group of people in this country who say the real issue is, as historian Rus Walton has described it, "...a deadly struggle — the forces of darkness against light," or Christianity against "Godless Communism."

This group of people, sometimes referred to as the Religious Right, maintains that "America" is the last bastion of all that is right and holy. And what is needed to defend this bastion is an ever stronger military and specifically "nuclear superiority."

Not only could this philosophy have obvious, tragic consequences, but the core of the philosophy is rotten: can you advocate the threat and use of nuclear arms and still call yourself a Christian?

You may ask, why pick on the Religious Right when there are many other sectors that believe in "peace" through the threat of nuclear destruction? For example, there are many people who stand to gain economically from the arms race. Billions of dollars, thousands of jobs and more than a few congressional seats depend on the incrementation of arms production. Then there are more than a few politicians who gain political support by describing the dangerous, fatal threat posed by the Soviet Union, and then presenting themselves as our saviors against that threat.

No, this column is about the Religious Right. As a group they are politically powerful and can sway the deciding vote either toward the side that profits from war or toward the side that profits from peace. In addition, as a group they seek, ostensibly, to do what is right. This is not to say that seeking military superiority as a way to get along in this world is not a valid option. (In fact, it is the only option we have tried since we became a world power.) It is a valid option, but is it a Christian option?

There are some concepts (which I consider myths) that cloud the issue. First is the myth that armament is the only way to defend the Gospel. Remember that the early Christians were up against much higher odds when they were being persecuted by the Roman Empire. The Christians never had any armies, but ended up "converting" Rome itself.

From another direction, look at the German Nazis. One of their excuses for their military buildup prior to World War II was to save Christianity from Bolshevism. Now half of Germany is communist.

What about the myth that communism can and will wipe out Christianity? Behold Poland, where about 60 to 65 percent of the people claim Christianity or Judaism. These are, coincidentally, about the same statistics as we have here in the United States (the last bastion of the Gospel).

This follows right into the third myth, that the United States either represents or personifies Christianity. Even Billy Graham has said, "It was a mistake to identify the Kingdom of God with the American way of life." Just ask a Black, a Native American, or a woman.

Another myth is that nuclear superiority is a Christian concept because it constitutes "peace through strength." A more precise phrase would be "power through coercion." That sounds almost like Mao Tse-Tung: "Power comes from the end of the gun." (And I always thought that the strength of Christianity lay in its ideas.)

Speaking of Christian ideas, over vacation I looked in the Revised Standard Version of the Bible to see what Jesus himself might have said about military buildups, specifically nuclear arms, in supposed defense of his own beliefs. I did not find one instance, of word or action, where he advocated the threat or use of weapons. But he did have specific things to say about how to deal with enemies:

"But I say to you that hear, love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, pray for those who abuse you. To him who strikes you on the cheek, offer the other also; and from him who takes away your coat do not withhold even your shirt." Luke 7:27-29

"And as you wish that men would do to you, do so to them. If you love those who love you, what credit is that to you? For even the sinners do the same." Luke 7:31-32

But I find that when I propose using this approach with the Russians, I am branded as naive, stupid and even communist-leaning, when all I did was quote Jesus.

I think that if one considers ideas such as the Golden Rule and turning the other cheek to be irrelevant and naive, there are several implications:

— That one considers that Jesus himself was naive.

— That one considers that he was a fine chap, in his day, but that his precepts do not have application in modern times.

— The implication that perhaps the Golden Rule was mistranslated. It originally read: Do unto others as (you think) they would do to you, but do it to the suckers first.

— There is the implication that the Devil is worse today than in Jesus' day. (Danny Boy, we are talking about the Russians, the personification of the Devil) and that Jesus could have had no way of foreseeing the Soviet Union. He therefore made no scriptural provisions for dealing with them.

I would submit that if any of the above four statements apply to a person who considers himself to be Christian, then he should seriously question whether he is one or not. What is more, he might hesitate before submitting the rest of us to the threat of a nuclear war to satisfy his beliefs.

This is not to say that there are not precedents in the Old Testament for decimating the enemy. For example, in Judges 20 and 21, a war is described in which 11 of the tribes of Israel killed off all of the tribe of Benjamin, except for 400 men who escaped into the hills. Out of compassion for these survivors, the other 11 tribes then went to a neighboring tribe and killed off all the inhabitants except 400 virgins, whom were then given to the men of Benjamin with which to repopulate their tribe. Surely even the Moral Majority would consider those measures extreme.

On the other hand, Deuteronomy 20:19 could be interpreted to rule out the likes of nuclear war:

"When you besiege a city for a long time, making war against it in order to take it, you shall not destroy its trees by wielding an axe against them; for you may eat of them, but you shall not cut them down."

You can't wage nuclear war without eliminating the trees.

Jesus himself cast his vote when he was being arrested at Gethsemane to be crucified. When Peter drew his sword to defend Jesus:

"Jesus said to him, 'Put your sword back into its place; for all who take the sword will perish by the sword.'" Matthew 26:52

If it is not Christianity we are defending, if we are not employing Christian precepts, then let's drop the entire religious framework and simply look at it as a materialistic battle. It boils down to this: Some people would rather risk destroying the forests, streams, farms, and yes, even the interstate highway system (not to mention a few million lives), just to save their '72 Chevys and heavily mortgaged home.

Putting both the world and your nice possessions within minutes of total destruction is a mighty strange strategy of protection.

Will the ultimate irony be that people will be willing to destroy the world to "defend" ideas they will not put into practice?

Rights commission not 'wasteful'

Editor:

Re: Editorial, "Wasteful government panels," in the Dec. 2 Collegian.

I think it might be useful to know that Brad Gillispie picked in the Civil Rights Commission the wrong example of a "wasteful government panel." That is, not only do the commissioners not get a "healthy salary" from government — they don't get anything except necessary expenses for attending meetings and hearings. All the members of the commission, to the best of my knowledge, have full-time jobs outside government, for which they are paid.

There is, of course, a quite large civil rights staff in government which serves, in part at least, as staff for the commission. This staff would, however, continue to be employed if the commission were abolished, since its major assignment is to see to the enforcement of laws now on the books.

Many government commissions, panels, etc. are temporary affairs set up to address a particular question or problem and make recommendations, and the members of these are generally not paid salaries (though their staffs, of course, are paid and sometimes their cost is considerable). There are also various permanent advisory groups, such as the Council of Economic Advisers, at least some of whose members are full-time and are paid salaries.

The argument is that members of the Civil Rights Commission are paid a "healthy salary" but have no power. Members of the commission serve without pay. One of their functions is to call public attention to areas in which elected or appointed government officials are not enforcing civil rights laws. There was a problem with the law establishing the commission in that no specific terms were fixed for membership. This has now been remedied, and Mr. Reagan has had a chance to name some of the members.

Department head instructs, assists disadvantaged youth

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

Helping youngsters get on the positive side of life is the reason Don Kirkendall, department head for the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies (PEDLS), spends his vacations and weekends involved with a youth program.

Kirkendall is one of 15 evaluators for the National Youth Sports Program, a program designed for economically disadvantaged youth in the United States. As an evaluator, Kirkendall troubleshoots for NYSP sites that are having problems, helps start new programs and inspects programs to make sure the guidelines set by the federal government are being followed.

NYSP is an organization that Kirkendall has been associated with since 1974, when he was an associate professor at the University of Kentucky. He heard about the program from a friend and decided to apply for a grant to initiate a program at Kentucky. He was given a program site in 1974 and served as program director until 1976, when he came to K-State.

The purpose of NYSP is to expand opportunities for poverty level youth between the ages of 10 and 18. The program, which runs five to six weeks during the summer, provides instruction in health and physical fitness along with skilled sports instruction.

The youngsters also spend a minimum of three hours a week in education. Topics covered are drug and alcohol abuse, job responsibilities, career opportunities, and health and nutritional practices.

By locating the program in an institution of higher education, the youth become acquainted with career and educational opportunities. An institution must be able to recruit 200 poverty level youth (as set by Community Actions Agency Poverty Guidelines) to be eligible for such a program.

"If we would have been able to locate sufficient number of youth, we would have had a grant here," Kirkendall said, "but to get that number of kids here on a daily basis, we would have had to ship them (to Manhattan) from all over."

Instead, the Advisory Committee of the NYSP asked him to continue being involved in the program as an evaluator and to help with program management.

There are approximately 130 programs in 45 states that serve over 50,000 youth each year. The programs operate on a total grant of $6 million.

"That is an incredibly small amount of money to reach that many kids," Kirkendall said. The money comes from the National Collegiate Athletic Association, which is awarded the original grant from the Office of Community Service, Health and Human Services.

The NCAA awards subgrants to approved institutions based on the number of participants in the program, the project content and length and the supporting services provided. It also is responsible for program direction and control, institution selection, approval of projects and project execution.

The institutions must provide specific services for youth to qualify as hosts for the program. The program content is divided into three areas: activities, enrichment and nutrition. The real value of the program is in the enrichment area, Kirkendall said, which includes activities such as field trips and education.

"In Kentucky we took the kids on a field trip to the state capitol, and it was incredible," he said. "We had 300 kids go that day, and only 40 of them had ever been to the capitol, which was less than 40 miles away."

In New York the youth may be taken to see a live theater or a dance production—something they might otherwise never have the opportunity to experience, he said, adding that the youngsters are exposed to a wider world of experiences than they've had before.

In the activity program, the youth spend 90 percent of their time in actual instruction. The institution must provide swimming instruction, as well as instruction in three of the following areas: gymnastics, basketball, volleyball, track and field, soccer, tennis, badminton, touch or flag football, wrestling, softball, physical fitness, dance or one other sport that is suitable to local interest and available facilities.

Another benefit of the program is in the nutrition area. A daily meal is provided for every enrollee. Most programs provide one hot meal a day, while others also offer breakfast or a nutritional snack. For some of the youth, this might be the only hot meal they get in a day, Kirkendall said.

All of the youth are required to have a physical examination before they can participate in the program. The grant provides $7 per participant for the medical exam, Kirkendall said, but the actual costs of the exam is about $50 per person.

However, he added that NYSP is committed to follow up on anything that might be found in the exam as far as the law will let them.

"Through the medical exam we located a girl who had Hodgkins disease, and she is undoubtedly alive today because through the exam doctors caught it in time," Kirkendall said.

O.J. Simpson and Archie Griffin, both former Heisman trophy winners, credit the program with helping turn their lives around and straightening them out, Kirkendall said.

Sports is the vehicle used by the program because the youngsters love to participate in sports, he said, but the real goal is to improve the participants' lives. What really determines if a program will work is the people or staff that run the program, he said, adding that if the people involved do not have the "absolute inner caring," the program fails.

"I think, more than anything, it is taking these kids out of the ghetto and having someone put his arm around them and say, 'I really care what happens to you.' That makes the difference to the youth," Kirkendall said.

Mary McElroy, associate professor of PEDLS, and Kirkendall have attempted to verify some of the benefits of the program. While they have published research articles dealing with the program's effect on the children's self-concept, positive attitudes, and career and educational aspirations, the two hope to do more research in these areas.

"This is the very best use of federal money that I've ever seen, and the federal government is getting a far higher rate of return than what is being spent on this program," Kirkendall said. "Besides that, it's for kids — kids who need a chance."

CHEF CAFE FAST BECOMING A FAVORITE AMONG STUDENTS

Downtown nestled just a quarter of a block south of Poyntz on Fourth Street lies Manhattan's oldest family owned and operated restaurant, "the Chef Cafe." The Chef Cafe is to downtown like Kite's is to Aggieville, a big favorite with a long standing tradition.

Recently the Chef, after 30 years in the same area, just finished major expansion and remodeling which has been met with very favorable response especially among K-State students, and it's no wonder. There isn't an item on the menu over $3.95 and that includes the full course meals complete with the best salad bar downtown has to offer.

Couple this with the fact that students get a 10% discount card good for the whole semester just for the asking, it's no wonder they've found a home away from home.

And if you're a movie buff, staying open till 9 p.m. and being just across from the Wareham Theater, enables many a movie goer to find the best possible combination for dinner and theater in town.

So if you're tired of eating out of a paper bag when, for the same price, you can enjoy homemade soups, pies, cookies, muffins, chili and daily specials then I'll be seeing you at "the Chef." And, oh yes, don't forget to ask for your student discount card.

Banker sentenced for fraud

WICHITA — Charles Grover Jr., former vice president of Citizens National Bank of Fort Scott, has been sentenced to five concurrent prison terms of five years each on embezzlement charges.

U.S. District Judge Sam Crow suspended all but six months of the sentence on the first count for Grover, who had pleaded guilty Tuesday. Crow recommended Grover serve the time at the minimum security federal prison camp at Leavenworth.

Grover pleaded guilty to five counts alleging he took nearly $59,000 from the bank's insurance premium account between November 1978 and December 1982, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Jack Williams. The money was repaid before Grover was charged in November, Williams said.

Tewes leaves 'The Love Boat'

LOS ANGELES — Actress Lauren Tewes, who plays a cruise director on ABC's "The Love Boat," will be taking up shore duty because of a contract dispute when the series resumes production next month.

Tewes, whose seven-year contract has expired, is leaving the show after failing to reach agreement on a new contract with executive producers Aaron Spelling and Douglas S. Cramer. She reportedly asked for $2 million a year, but her personal manager, Tom Barad, said the figure was "inaccurate."

Don DeMesquita, a spokesman for the producers, stressed that the actress was not fired, and confirmed the lack of agreement on a contract.

Tewes starred as cruise director Julie McCoy on the popular comedy. She will be replaced by Patricia Klous — who previously starred in "Aloha Paradise" and "Flying High."

Ted McGinley, who previously appeared on ABC's "Happy Days," will also join the cast for the eighth season as the new ship's photographer, Ace.

Royal couple finally find privacy

GENEVA, Switzerland — Prince Charles and Princess Diana finally found some privacy on their skiing holiday in Liechtenstein after hordes of photographers and reporters apparently responded to Buckingham Palace's plea to leave the royal couple in peace.

"After Monday's photo session, we pulled back our team of photographers and journalists," said Peter Uebersax, editor of Blick, Switzerland's biggest-selling popular tabloid.

On Tuesday, most Swiss papers carried only a photograph with a brief caption and coverage of the royal pair had fallen off completely Wednesday.

Onassis tours India, visits son

NEW DELHI, India — Former U.S. first lady Jacqueline Onassis is making a private visit to India to see her son and tour the country.

Onassis, the widow of President John F. Kennedy and Greek shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis, came to New Delhi a few days ago. Onassis, who is accompanied by her son, John Kennedy Jr., is scheduled to tour various towns for 10 days before returning to the Indian capital on Jan. 21, the source said.

The younger Kennedy, a history graduate from Brown University, in Rhode Island, arrived last September on a study tour devoted mainly to Indian culture and history.

Chinese see televised view of Premier Ziyang's U.S. visit

By The Associated Press

PEKING — The pageantry of a White House welcome for Premier Zhao Ziyang flickered on millions of television sets Wednesday from Shanghai's teeming tenements to the dusty hovels of Peking.

It was a rare glimpse of the United States for China's estimated 30 million television viewers, and appeared to be a carefully orchestrated attempt to put a good face on U.S.-China relations despite differences over Taiwan.

The Communist government's state-run television network devoted the first 17 minutes of its evening news — China's most popular program — to President Reagan's welcome ceremony for Zhao in Washington on Tuesday.

China's time is 13 hours ahead of Washington's.

Taiwan was not mentioned until the segment was nearly over. But the newscast quoted Zhao as telling Reagan that China would never promise to avoid use of force in securing the capitalist island, which the Communists in Peking consider a renegade province.

Camera crews in Zhao's press entourage panned a crowd of smiling Chinese and American faces on the White House South Lawn, showed Reagan and Zhao embracing and at one point walking arm in arm.

The Chinese cameras dwelt on the pageantry after Zhao stepped out of a large black American limousine, greeted members of the Cabinet and stood at attention as a military band played the U.S. and Chinese national anthems.

Zhao, dressed in a Western business suit, was shown toasting his hosts at a State Department reception, downing his glass after saying "ganbei (bottoms up)."

Zhao, 64, is the first Chinese premier to visit the United States since China-U.S. relations were normalized in January 1979 after a 30-year lapse.

He also is a close associate of Deng Xiaoping, 79, China's pragmatic senior leader. Deng journeyed to the United States when diplomatic ties were re-established by then President Jimmy Carter.

But Deng's travels were seen by few Chinese because at that time there were not many television sets here. Since then, the total production of TV sets has more than quintupled.

There has been no mention in the state-run press of the Chinese hecklers near the White House who denounced the Peking government and urged Reagan to ban high-technology sales to China.

Lebanese battles halt peace plan

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Government troops and Moslem insurgents exchanged intense artillery fire and battled with mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and machine guns Wednesday in suburban Beirut and the neighboring hills.

The fighting forced a delay in working out agreement on the Saudi Arabian-mediated plan to separate Lebanon's civil war antagonists.

U.S. special envoy Donald Rumsfeld flew to Beirut from Israel to brief Lebanese leaders on his tour of the Middle East and to discuss ways to end the fighting in Lebanon.

Official sources in Damascus said he would visit the Syrian capital today for talks with Foreign Minister Abdul-Halim Khaddam.

Scattered battles flared in the Shiite Moslem suburbs on Beirut's southern sector and the Druse-inhabited hills above the U.S. Marine base at the airport. Marine spokesman Maj. Dennis Brooks said there were heavy artillery exchanges to the north at midmorning. He said the Marines serving with the multinational force were not involved.

State-run Beirut radio said the four-man committee representing the Lebanese army and Druse, Shiite and Christian militias called a cease-fire at midday to halt the battles. The truce held for half an hour, then was riddled by minor violations. No casualties were reported.

The committee was scheduled to consider last minute problems with the Saudi disengagement plan to avoid "a setback during implementation." But it was forced to deal with the new fighting instead, the radio said. The government withdrew 3,000 troops and 350 policemen it had assembled in the capital to enforce the plan that would establish buffer zones to separate the rival factions.

Vatican relations spur suit

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Topeka civil-rights lawyer sued President Reagan Wednesday for appointing William Wilson to be ambassador to the Vatican.

The attorney, Fred W. Phelps, is the plaintiff in a suit filed in U.S. District Court here. It names Reagan and Wilson as defendants and asks the court to prohibit the president from establishing diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

In the suit, Phelps contended that sending a U.S. ambassador to the Holy See violates the prohibition against establishment of a state church contained in the First Amendment to the Constitution.

"The Holy See is not a foreign government, as such, with which this government has a legitimate need to establish such relations but is, instead, merely the headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church..." Phelps' lawsuit stated.

It also said Reagan's action in appointing Wilson as ambassador to the Vatican "is patently violative of the establishment clause of the First Amendment, in that it purposely accomplishes a predominantly religious purpose, it has the effect of favoring one religion over another."

Economics may be 'volatile' issue in election year, experts predict

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Economic policy-makers are faced with key decisions this year concerning the federal budget but will probably duck the issue, a panel of economic experts said Tuesday.

"Policy choices made during 1984 will be crucial to the health of the economy in 1985 and beyond," Lyle Gramley, a governor of the Federal Reserve System, told a Midwest Research Institute outlook conference.

The cyclical history of the U.S. economy, however, "does not hold out much hope," Gramley said.

Rep. James R. Jones, D-Okla., chairman of the House Budget Committee, said the remedies at hand are not acceptable to politicians in an election year. "We see the problems, we see the solutions, but no one wants to move with vigor because of politically volatile questions" the solutions would create, he said.

Jones said congressmen generally agree in private conversations on the steps needed to trim the deficit that threatens to climb to nearly $300 billion by the end of the decade.

"We've got to reduce the growth in military expenditures, which consume close to 30 percent of the budget; we've got to reduce the rate at which entitlement programs are growing, about 42 percent of the budget, and (we've got) to reduce the cost of paying off our debts, which is somewhere between 10 and 15 percent," Jones said. "We also need to raise revenues."

The Oklahoma congressmen said there appears to be no threat that failure to resolve the deficit will cause great economic harm immediately "so political advisers all around say, 'Wait until after the election.'"

Jones said even Martin S. Feldstein, President Reagan's chief economic adviser, has argued that deficit-slashing action needs to begin this year to forestall a recession in 1985.

"But without a groundswell of public opinion to force the action, we have to go home and tell our constituents, 'I've cut your programs and raised your taxes.' It's not the best platform on which to run," Jones said.

State to scrutinize teachers' pay

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gordon Schultz, chairman of the state Board of Education, said Wednesday he hopes board members will make recommendations to the Kansas Legislature on teachers' salaries at their meeting next month.

Although the board discussed teachers' salaries when it met Wednesday, it delayed making any recommendations until board members had more time to study salary proposals.

"The salary issue has been taboo," Schultz said at a news conference after the meeting. "We have all the information we need to make a recommendation. We're just loathe to do it."

Although Gov. John Carlin and some board members oppose using merit pay to increase teachers' salaries, Schultz said he hopes the board will endorse that method.

The board has recommended a blue-ribbon committee be appointed to study teachers' salaries, but Schultz admitted the committee would be unnecessary if the board took a definite position on the issue.

U.S. Education Secretary Terrill Bell included teachers' salaries in four goals for education he proposed at the National Forum for Education in December.

The secretary said he wants beginning teachers' salaries to be competitive with salaries earned by college graduates in business or engineering by 1989.

According to a report by the state Department of Education, beginning teachers' salaries in Kansas average $13,860, while accountants earn $19,212, civil engineers earn $20,640 and chemical engineers earn $26,568.

Bell also recommended high school graduation requirements include four years of English and three years each of math, science and social studies by 1989.

Although Kansas high schools meet the goals for English and social studies, they require only two years of math and science for graduation.

Bell also proposed that the ACT-SAT scores attained by the high school graduating class of 1985 be exceeded by the class of 1989. ACT and SAT are standardized tests taken by high school students nationally.

According to the report, high school graduates in Kansas exceeded the national average on both tests in 1983 and scored about the same on SAT tests in 1972 and 1983. But they scored slightly lower on ACT tests in 1983 than they did in 1967.

Board members were told that ACT scores for Kansas were available only back to 1967, and to 1972 for SAT scores.

The staff warned in its report, however, that "extreme caution should be used in judging the quality of Kansas education by student performance on standardized tests."

Kansas high schools have historically met the last of the secretary's goals that by 1989 no state will have a high school dropout rate of more than 10 percent.

Under questioning, the State Department official said Syria forces would not necessarily have to pull out of northern Lebanon for U.S. Marines to come home, although a major goal of U.S. policy has been the withdrawal of all foreign troops.

Dam disclosed that the Lebanese government had requested a substantial increase in U.S. military aid, and said that "we are sympathetic to the idea." He said the administration has not agreed on a specific request to submit to Congress.

If Congress advances the April 1985 deadline for withdrawing the Marines, Dam said, "then Syria would be encouraged to believe that it can win the game by digging in...Syria might conclude that we are finished in Lebanon and on the way out."

K-State returns home to tangle with EWU in basketball action

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

After running its record to 6-5 over the Christmas holidays, K-State's men's basketball team returns to Ahearn Field House tonight to face Eastern Washington University. The Eagles, a Division I independent, come into the 7:30 p.m. contest with a 2-13 record.

K-State will be trying to rebound from a 67-64 road loss to Northern Iowa University on Jan. 7. The setback ran the 'Cats' record to 2-3 over the Christmas break.

All of the 'Cats' defeats have been on the road, while their six victories have come at Ahearn.

The Wildcats opened play over the holiday break with a 84-78 loss to 14th-ranked University of Nevada-Las Vegas on Dec. 17.

K-State came out smoking early in the contest, quickly jumping to a 13-4 lead. UNLV fought back and tied the score for the first time at 25-all and went into the locker room with a 46-44 intermission edge.

Junior Eric Watson knotted the score at 46-all at the start of the half, but UNLV forward Richie Adams, who scored seven of the Running Rebels' first 20 second-half points, helped UNLV take control thereafter. Also aiding the UNLV cause were seven K-State turnovers in the first 11 minutes of the second half.

After surging to a 67-56 lead, UNLV went into a delay game, breaking through the Wildcat defense for several slam dunks while eating up valuable minutes off the clock.

UNLV commanded the action for the rest of the game, but a scrapping K-State later cut the deficit to 84-78 as time ran out.

Junior Eddie Elder paced K-State with 19 points while junior Tom Alfaro added 15. Sophomore Ben Mitchell also hit double figures with 12 points while freshman Alex Williams came off the bench to chip in with 10.

Despite the loss, Head Coach Jack Hartman was pleased with the 'Cats' performance.

"We did a lot of things well," Hartman said. "Their speed and quickness were the biggest factors in the game. We played hard."

K-State's second consecutive road defeat — a 56-53 overtime squeaker on Dec. 21 — came at the hands of the University of Indiana.

The two teams played evenly for much of the first half, but the Hoosiers built a 28-21 lead with two minutes to go in the half. The Wildcats fought back, however, to trail by only three at halftime, 28-25.

The Wildcats controlled action in the second half of play, taking a 35-34 lead on two free throws by sophomore Jim Roder.

With 1:40 left in regulation play and the score tied at 49, the Hoosiers elected to go for the last shot. The Indiana shot fell short with five seconds left, giving Roder a last-second try from the top of the key, but the ball rimmed out as time expired.

Two Elder free throws deadlocked the score at 53-53 with 3:22 remaining in the overtime period before the Hoosiers again worked for the last shot. Indiana's Chuck Franz drove the baseline, making the basket as well as drawing a foul from K-State's Mitchell. Franz hit the free throw to ice the victory for Indiana and hand the Wildcats their fifth straight loss in the series between the two schools.

Mitchell finished with 20 points for K-State while Alfaro and Watson each added 10 apiece.

Watson then came back to team with Elder — each scoring 12 points — to lead the Wildcats to a 64-50 rout over California State University-Northridge, Dec. 23, at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats needed only the first half to put a lock on the game as they forged a comfortable 36-19 halftime lead. The Matadors took over five minutes to score their first field goal while committing 12 turnovers in the opening half.

CSUN would later cut the Wildcat lead to 10 in the second half, but K-State still managed to hang on for the 14-point victory, which marked win No. 400 for Jack Hartman — making him the 15th active Division I coach to gain 400 victories in a career.

"It's nice to get it (the 400th victory) out of the way," Hartman said. After a 12-day layoff, K-State returned to its home floor Jan. 4 to dump the University of Texas Longhorns, 64-54.

K-State controlled the lead for all but the first two minutes of the contest, building up a 35-21 edge with four minutes left in the first half before Texas reeled off eight unanswered points to cut the margin to 35-29 at the half.

The Longhorns kept close for the first part of the second half before sophomore forward Parker Laketa helped the Wildcats pull away. With the 'Cats leading only 43-39, Laketa came off the bench to hit three straight jumpers.

The Texas game was the last time Laketa would play for the Wildcats as he decided to stop playing because of problems with his right knee.

Elder then put the final touches on the victory with a slam dunk and a free throw to push the 'Cats ahead to 62-54. Mitchell hit the game's final bucket for the final score.

All five Wildcat starters scored in double figures with Mitchell leading the way with 16 points.

K-State next traveled to Cedar Falls, Iowa, absorbing a slim 67-64 loss to Northern Iowa on Jan. 7. The Panthers had previously lost five games at the hands of K-State at Ahearn Field House.

For 30 minutes of the contest, Northern Iowa dominated the action and constructed a 35-26 intermission lead. The Wildcats would later find themselves down by as many as 16 points with eight minutes of play left.

The Wildcats, behind the play of junior reserve Mark Bohm and Williams, came back and outscored the Panthers 14-2. Williams posted up on the shorter Northern Iowa frontline and put down 11 of his 17 points down the stretch. Bohm also hit two key baskets.

With two minutes left in the game, Williams scored again to pull the 'Cats within one at 63-62. After a missed Northern Iowa free throw, Roder hit an 18-foot shot to give K-State its first lead of the night, 64-63.

Northern Iowa didn't fold, however, and with six seconds left Randy Kraayenbrink, who led all scorers with 28 points, scored to give the Panthers the lead. K-State, which had no time outs remaining, was whistled for a technical when Bohm called a time out. Kraayenbrink connected on two charity shots to give Northern Iowa the victory.

Roder followed William's team-high, and career-high, 17 points with 13.

K-State will be looking for its seventh win against Eastern Washington, which play a three-guard offense and are led by 6-foot-9 center Tony Chrisman, who is averaging 15.8 points a contest. Jeff Reinland, a 6-foot-2 guard, is next with 13.2 points per game for the Eagles.

Coach Hartman has made a change in the Wildcats' starting lineup for tonight's game. Williams will replace Alfaro in the starting five and man the center position. Elder will move from the center spot to forward, his more natural position.

Staff/Rob Clark Jr.

Parker Laketa, former Wildcat forward, watches from the bench Wednesday as the team prepares for tonight's game with Eastern Washington University. Laketa announced he would leave the team due to knee problems after the Jan. 4 game against the University of Texas.

Hoop season ends early for Laketa

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

At the start of K-State's 1983-84 basketball campaign, Parker Laketa had a feeling he wouldn't be able to finish the season because of the problems his right knee has caused him since high school. This became reality Jan. 4 for the 6-foot-7, 220-pound sophomore, after K-State played the University of Texas.

"I didn't know how to quit, so I've continued to play," Laketa said, after starting the season with a lot of pain in his right knee. "The hardest thing I had to do was to admit to myself that I had to quit."

In sixth grade, Laketa's knee problems began when he had surgery on his left knee. That surgery was successful and the knee gave him no more problems.

But when he was a senior at Homewood-Flossmoor High School in Chicago, the problems with his right knee began. Since then, Laketa has had his right knee operated on three separate times.

During his first season at K-State in 1980, Laketa was out due to a medical hardship ruling and he sat at the end of the Wildcat bench each game with his leg in a brace. He came back the next season and played in 14 games, including starts against the University of Kansas and the University of Missouri. He averaged 4.4 points and 1.5 rebounds per game that season.

"I'll remember starting against KU and Missouri because the team played good in those games," he said. "They were big games."

During the Colorado game last year, Laketa came off the bench to score a career high 12 points and five rebounds. For the season, he had a .535 field goal percentage and was .800 at the charity strip.

Laketa's final decision to quit playing basketball — the sport he had grown up with — came on the Monday before the Texas game. After the team physician, Dr. Guy Smith, read X-rays that were taken, Laketa knew it was time to stop playing.

"The X-rays were compared to those of last year and the knee had deteriorated a lot," Laketa said.

Prior to the Texas game, no one knew that the game was to be Laketa's last because, he said, he didn't want anyone to feel sorry for him.

"Coach Hartman didn't know about it (the decision) before the game and I didn't want him to find out, so I didn't tell anyone," Laketa said. "I didn't want him playing me because it was my last game, but rather playing me to help the team."

During his ten minutes of playing time in the second half against Texas, Laketa was three of five from the field, along with one rebound and one assist.

For now, Laketa remains on scholarship and continues to attend practices.

"I just sit there and watch them practice. That's about all I can do," Laketa said. "I'll be able to help with the junior varsity since I know the program and I'll help the team — telling them what I can see them doing, good or bad, from a spectator's view."

In the future, Laketa said he wants to get away from basketball for a while.

"I've been around it all my life. My dad is a coach and was my (high school) coach. So, I want to get out of it for a while, or at least until I start missing it," he said.

For the remainder of the season, number 40 on K-State's men's basketball squad will be watching the games from the sidelines.

Major football schools fail to attain number one goal

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — Major football powers, which had threatened to pull out of the NCAA, were appeased Wednesday when smaller schools agreed to two of three demands made by the larger Division I-A schools.

However, the major football schools said they would not be completely satisfied until they attain their No. 1 goal — legislative autonomy within the NCAA.

"I think a lot of people feel a lot better now," said Wayne Duke, commissioner of the Big Ten Conference.

Delegates agreed to reconsider — and then approved — two proposals whose defeat Tuesday triggered an angry barrage toward the smaller Division I schools.

One proposal will allow the 105 Division I-A schools have a separate legislative meeting in June, the other allows financially disadvantaged students to receive federal aid in addition to their athletic scholarship money.

A move to reconsider the question on Division I-A autonomy failed by 11 votes.

"That remains the main issue facing Division I-A," said Vince Dooley, Georgia's football coach and athletic director.

"I was gratified to see a reaffirmation of the conscience of the convention," Dooley said after Wednesday's action. "But I still feel the same way about I-A autonomy."

There are 278 schools in Division I, the NCAA's top division, broken up into I-A, I-AA and "I-Other." The 105 I-A schools include the 60 members of the College Football Association, the Big Ten and Pac-10 conferences and 25 others. The 84 Division I-AA schools are those with smaller football programs. The other 89 are almost all basketball-playing schools, such as DePaul and Marquette.

In defeating the I-A autonomy proposal, some schools said they feared the major powers would increase the size of their basketball squads and coaching staffs and eventually squeeze everyone else out of the lucrative NCAA basketball tournament.

Sooners fall to OSU

By The Associated Press

Barry Stevens scored 29 points to lead Iowa State to a 74-68 upset of 17th-ranked Oklahoma in the Big Eight opener for both teams Wednesday night.

Stevens got plenty of support from sophomore point guard Jeff Hornacek, who scored 20 points. Iowa State center David Moss, another sophomore, added 15.

The Sooners' Wayman Tisdale was held to 22 points. He came into the game averaging 29.4 points a game to lead conference scorers. Stevens entered the game as the Big Eight's No. 2 scorer, with a 24.4-point average.

The Sooners, who broke into the Top 20 for the first time this week, scored the game's first field goal, but never led again. They twice trailed by 11 points in the first half, and were behind 38-33 at halftime.

Oklahoma cut Iowa State's lead to 54-53 with 7 minutes left, but Stevens and Hornacek hit long jump shots to pad the Cyclone lead.

Iowa State is now 10-3 for the season. Oklahoma fell to 12-2.

Meanwhile, Carl Henry poured in 18 points to lead six Jayhawks in double figures as Kansas crushed Texas Southern 101-64 in non-conference action.

Kansas led 44-24 at halftime. The Jayhawks scored on 46 percent of their shots from the field, while their man-to-man defense limited the Tigers to only 34 percent.

Brian Martin scored 16 points, and Kelly Knight added 15 and pulled down nine rebounds for Kansas. Greg Dreiling, Ron Kellogg and Calvin Thompson added 12 points apiece.

Andre Applewhite scored 14 points, Lester Brooks had 12 and Ed Hilliard and Lee Gibson added 10 apiece for Texas Southern.

The Jayhawks, who hadn't scored more than 100 points since beating Rollins College 101-47 in 1980, raised their record to 8-4. Texas Southern fell to 4-9.

Malcolm Thomas scored a game-high 21 points as Missouri overcame a cold first half to defeat Northern Iowa 80-65 in a non-conference game.

The Tigers shot only 36 percent from the field in the opening half and led 37-36 at halftime.

Missouri jumped back into the game in the second half, hitting a hot 71 percent from the field in the half.

Prince Bridges scored 13 points, and Ted Mimmitt added 12 for the victorious Tigers, whose record rose to 10-3.

Eisenhower influence still strong at Hope golf tourney

By The Associated Press

It was the day Ike cried.

"We were paying special tribute to General Eisenhower and he was sitting in the stands with Mamie," Bob Hope recalled, as he prepared for the tee off today in the 25th of his Bob Hope Desert Golf Classics. "Without his knowing it, we had an army band with a color guard march up the 18th fairway."

"Mamie told me it was the first time in 35 years she had seen Ike cry."

Hope's unique five-day event, mixing the greatest golfers of the world with movie stars, political and industrial tycoons, has come to represent the harbinger of the new season.

It is the first tournament of the PGA Tour to be televised nationally by a network. Traditionally, because of the time slot, the beautiful Palm Springs, Calif., setting and Hope's flair for the theatrical, it gets the best ratings of the year, exceeding the Masters, U.S. Open and PGA.

Sandwiched between the National Football League conference championships and the Super Bowl, it will be aired by NBC 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. EST both Saturday and Sunday.

"All winners since 1963 are here this year with the exception of Jack Nicklaus," Hope said. "Jack is out building another golf course. You know, he builds one a day."

Arnold Palmer heads the distinguished cast of alumni. Arnie won the first Hope Classic in 1960 and added four after that to become the all-time winner. It also was his last tour victory in 1973.

"I know Arnie's here," Hope quipped. "I saw his tractor in the parking lot," a reference to Palmer's TV commercial for Pennzoil.

There is a special magnetism about this golf tournament. It is half-golf and half-lawn party. Top golfers rarely miss it. Corporate millionaires pull wires to get on the invitation list. The movie colony pours down from Los Angeles. Political wheels fly in from Washington, D.C.

"Golf doesn't play politics," Hope insists. "We invite Former President Gerry Ford and Tip O'Neill (Speaker of the House)."

Former Vice-President Spiro Agnew has figured in two dramatic and unsettling episodes.

One year, driving off, Spiro con-ed his playing partner, Doug Sanders, with an atrocious slice. Agnew was great at first but damage was minimal. Another time, during the riotous 1960s, a man charged Agnew in the stands, screaming obscenities.

"A kook," Hope explained, "quickly ejected."

The Eisenhower influence remains strong 15 years after his death. The La Quinta Country Club, tournament headquarters and one of the four courses used in the event, sits beside a meandering road named Eisenhower Drive. A large part of the proceeds go to the Eisenhower Medical Center.

"We contribute to 40 charities," Hope said. "We already have given $11 million to Ike's Center. We raise $350,000 at our kickoff party Monday night."

Eisenhower led victorious armies and presided over the nation during a period of its greatest tranquility, but his passion was golf. He set up a winter White House at Augusta, Ga., site of the Masters, and used golf as an antidote to his pressures.

It provides the same escape valve for the amazing, 80-year-old Hope, who seems to be on a constant treadmill, if not entertaining troops overseas, then doing hour-long spectacles for TV, filming commercials and traveling the theater circuit.

"In the beginning, I would take breaks and go to Palm Springs for some relaxation and golf," he said. "I never intended to sponsor a tournament."

"The original tournament in Palm Springs was called the Thunderbird. But it got into a bind and they asked if I would help get a sponsor. I got Chrysler. Before I knew it, it was the Hope Classic."

When the indefatigable comedian with the ski-slope nose went on the road again over the holidays to entertain U.S. servicemen in the Middle East, he took along two items that had become his trademark — a cast of pretty girls and a golf driver.

"Servicemen react to both," he said. "They know me for golf. I hit balls off the Carrier Guam. In the Vietnam War, I hit buckets of balls into the China Sea and pelted other boats close by."

"Once I took a swing at an imaginary ball on the deck, turned and said to a guy, 'Pick up that ball and follow me.' The guys loved it."

'Skins hope to keep team intact

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With their second straight Super Bowl appearance still more than a week away, the Washington Redskins are mapping strategy to keep the "Hogs," as well as the rest of the team, penned in for next season.

The Redskins will be facing the AFC champion Los Angeles Raiders in Tampa, Fla.

Several players already have admitted talking with United States Football League teams, and NFL Most Valuable Player Joe Theismann, quarterback of the Redskins, has openly expressed displeasure with his contract.

"The important thing is for us to keep everybody together," Redskins' General Manager Bobby Beathard said.

All-pro guard Russ Grimm reportedly has had contact with the USFL's Pittsburgh Maulers, who would like the University of Pittsburgh product to anchor a line in

"When everything is finished up after the Super Bowl, I'll have to think things out," Grimm said.

Even 'Skins' backup quarterback Bob Holly, a seldom-used player in his second year out of Princeton University, is thinking about a change. His attorney, Craig Fenech, is reported to be telling USFL teams that Holly's services carry a $200,000 price tag.

"Right now, Bob is the lowest paid second-string quarterback in the league," Fenech said. "The facts are simple. If Bob is not compensated here, he will be somewhere else."

The Redskins were relatively lucky at keeping the team intact after their Super Bowl victory over the Miami Dolphins in last year's strike-shortened season. Veteran cornerback Jeris White sat out this season after the team refused to renegotiate his contract. All-pro safety Tony Peters was forced to sit out the season after pleading guilty to cocaine trafficking.

But, this year, eight players are negotiating new contracts. And the problems don't end there.

Theismann, who has two years left on his current pact, has not concealed his desire for a new contract.

At $315,000 a year, the MVP ranks 18th in salary among quarterbacks — not all of them starters. Incentive clauses may bring his pay to more than $400,000 this season, but he says he wants owner Jack Kent Cooke to come up with more money.

Reserve linebacker Larry Kubin has negotiated with several USFL teams, according to his attorney, Robert Bennett. Kubin, a sixth-round draft choice in 1981 who plays primarily on special teams, is reportedly asking for a three-year, $800,000 contract.

Monte Coleman, an anchor of the Redskins defense is also a free agent on Feb. 1, but Redskins officials are confident they can keep him on the team. "I'm happy with the Redskins," Coleman said. "I hope we can work it out."

For all the questions about contract problems, Cooke has shown a willingness to stand firm in the past. Faced with an ultimatum from John Riggins in 1980, Cooke refused to renegotiate and Riggins sat out the year at his Kansas home.

Former baseball stars receive membership in Cooperstown

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — On the day after they were elected to baseball's Hall of Fame, Don Drysdale and Harmon Killebrew found it hard to believe that the kids who were awe-struck rookies three decades ago were now bona fide subjects of awe.

"I was just happy to be a big-league ballplayer," Killebrew said. "I never thought I would be considered with players like Babe Ruth, Lou Gehrig or Ted Williams."

Drysdale, Killebrew and Luis Aparicio were formally introduced as the latest Hall inductees Wednesday. Aparicio, the first Venezuelan to be elected, stayed home because of commitments to broadcast baseball games, but said he felt "great happiness."

All three, in fact, are now part-time broadcasters. But as players they were a study in contrasting baseball skills — Drysdale, the hard-throwing right-hander who challenged any hitter venturing too close to the plate; Killebrew, the slugger whose 573 home runs were the most ever for any American League player except for Ruth; Aparicio, a burglar at shortstop who led the AL in stolen bases for nine consecutive seasons.

But what Killebrew and Drysdale remembered was the beginning.

"I was just a 17-year-old farm boy from Payette, Idaho," Killebrew said, who joined the Washington Senators direct from high school.

"Suddenly there I was in Washington. I had never seen a major league game, I had never been in a major league ballpark."

Ironically, for a player known later for his lack of speed, he made his first appearance as a pinch runner against the Chicago White Sox.

"I got down to first base, and there was Walt Dropo," he recalled. "I looked down at second and there was Nellie Fox. Over at shortstop was Chico Carrasquel. A few days before, I had been reading about these guys and now I was in the same game with them."

Drysdale, who won 209 games in 14 seasons with the Brooklyn and

Los Angeles Dodgers and who holds the major league record of 58 consecutive scoreless innings, had a similar experience.

"I've always said my biggest thrill was walking into the Dodger clubhouse for the first time and seeing all those people like Pee Wee Reese, Jackie Robinson, Duke Snider and Gil Hodges," he said.

"But everything I did kept getting bigger and bigger."

Aparicio, who played in 2,581 major league games over 18 seasons from 1956 to 1974, led the balloting with 341 or 84.6 percent of the 403 votes cast by 10-year members of the Baseball Writers Association of America. Seventy-five percent — 303 votes — were necessary for election.

"I feel great happiness," an emotional Aparicio said in Valencia, Venezuela. "The triumph is not only mine, it is also for my dear Venezuela."

Killebrew had 335 votes, 83.1 percent, and Drysdale had 316, 78.4 percent. Hoyt Wilhelm, the knuckle-balling relief pitcher who pitched until he was 49 years old, fell 13 votes short with 290.

L.A. lineman set to block Manley

By The Associated Press

MANHATTAN BEACH, Calif. — It'll be the "Hogs" on one side and "five large, powerful men" on the other in Super Bowl XVIII.

The offensive line of the Washington Redskins became known as the "Hogs" during the 1982 National Football League season. And as the Redskins went through the play-offs and beat Miami in the Super Bowl, the unit earned a large reputation.

That's fine with tackle Bruce Davis of the Los Angeles Raiders, who is happy to toil in anonymity.

"We just have five large, powerful men," Davis said Wednesday. "I don't care for a nickname. When you start getting a reputation around this league, sometimes it makes people play harder against you."

"I'm thrilled for them — they're a good offensive line," said Davis, whose Raiders face the Redskins in the NFL championship game at Tampa, Fla., Jan. 22. "But there are other offensive lines around the league who don't have the name."

"They're a powerful unit. Their scheme allows them to be good. Their zone blocking allows (running back) John Riggins to find the holes," he said.

Davis said he believes the Raiders' offensive line — with Henry Lawrence at the other tackle, Mickey Marvin and Charley Hannah at the guards and Dave Dalby at center — is as good as any team's.

He acknowledged that Los Angeles' offensive line had some problems early in the season. Hannah came to the team in a trade from Tampa last summer and replaced injured Curt Marsh.

"Offensive line play is chemistry," said Davis. "At the beginning of the year, Charley Hannah and I were total strangers. It took us a while to get that chemistry. It takes a while for that kind of thing."

Davis is looking forward to the confrontation between Los Angeles' offensive line and the Redskin defensive unit.

"They have the No. 1 unit in the league against the rush," said Davis. "That's a big challenge for us. I have (Washington defensive end) Dexter Manley, the mouth of their defense. He's a good defensive end, but I've played against better."

"They use one of the old philosophies, a 4-3 defense. The key for us is to keep them off balance, maybe trap them now and then," he said. "I believe the team that has the better running game will win the game."

"In order to beat them, we're going to have to be able to run the ball very well and throw when we want to, not when we have to."

The Redskins are three-point favorites over the Raiders.

"Being the underdog doesn't mean that much," said Davis. "That's a role we're familiar with. I think this game is pretty evenly matched."

Soviets acknowledge gas pipeline damage

By The Associated Press
MOSCOW (AP) — The Soviet Union on Wednesday confirmed that fire damaged a compressor station on the Siberian natural gas pipeline, but denied Western reports that the blaze and other problems would delay its completion.

The fire reportedly occurred in mid-December, and it was the first time the Soviets acknowledged damage to the pipeline system that will carry natural gas to Western Europe. The official press also confirmed that the pipeline is only in partial operation.

But the Soviets used the occasion to trumpet the progress made on the massive project so far and insisted it would be finished on time despite U.S. sanctions, reported delays in equipment deliveries and other obstacles.

"All the contentions by Western propaganda that the pipeline supposedly will not be ready by the scheduled date are nothing but an attempt to engage in wishful thinking," said Gas Industry Minister Vasily Dinkov.

Dinkov said the pipeline would be in full operation by the second quarter of 1984, the official news agency Tass reported.

But a Western businessman, who spoke on condition he not be identified, said there have been delays in delivery of Western-built equipment for the line, some of it due to the U.S. sanctions. He said the line won't reach full capacity until 1985.

Western experts agree the pipeline is in place. It begins in Urengoi in northwest Siberia and runs 2,759 miles southwest to the Soviet town of Uzhgorod on the Czechoslovakian border.

But the experts say the Soviets have finished only two of the 41 compressor stations needed to operate it at full capacity.

Some experts said it was conceivable the Soviets are pumping gas through the line, perhaps even at the rate claimed Wednesday — about one-third of potential peak capacity.

But it was impossible to determine whether the gas was being pumped by compressor stations built specifically for the line or if it was being shunted back and forth between the export line and other parts of the vast Soviet gas delivery network.

Dinkov said the pipeline currently pumps 37 million cubic meters of gas per day. A Western diplomat, who also asked anonymity, said that was possible with the two compressor stations believed completed.

Other sources said neither of the compressor stations was actually operating and that the Soviets have been pumping gas with compressors on parallel, interconnected pipelines.

The Western businessman said fire broke out Dec. 15 in a building housing control panels and other equipment for the first pumping station on the line. He said the fire was quickly extinguished and no one was believed injured, but the blaze will delay completion of the station for six months.

The Western diplomat said the control panels were destroyed and the building burned to the ground.

Dinkov said the station is not critical to running the line because the station "will go into operation only after pressure at the (gas) deposit drops to a certain level."

Convicted man may appeal charges in Iola murder case

By The Associated Press
TOPEKA — Nathaniel "Yorkie" Smith, who was convicted last August of a 1982 triple murder near Iola, has filed a formal notice indicating he will appeal his convictions to the Kansas Supreme Court.

Smith's attorney, Robert Manske, filed the notice of appeal with the Shawnee County District Court on Jan. 6, but has yet to file the necessary documents with the state's high court. He must do so later this month.

A native of Iola, Smith was found guilty of 16 criminal charges by a Shawnee County District Court jury for the killing of a woman and two teen-age boys, and the beating and sexual assault of another teen-ager in the summer of 1982 near the southeast Kansas community of Iola.

Smith, 37, was sentenced to seven life terms in prison for the three murders and four counts of aggravated kidnapping, one involving each of the victims. That made him ineligible for parole for 105 years. He also was sentenced to a minimum of 145 years for nine other felony convictions, two of which were unrelated to the killings.

The murders occurred within three months after Smith was released on parole from the Kansas State Penitentiary after serving eight years of a 12 years-to-life sentence for a second-degree murder conviction in 1974 in Wyandotte County.

In the Iola murder case, Smith was convicted of the killings of Steven Mangus, 17, of Gas; Adeline Fisk, 59, of rural Iola; and Thomas Walsh, 17, of Iola. In addition, he was convicted of the beating and sexual assault of a 16-year-old youth from Gas.

Two of the victims, Fisk and Mangus, were shot a total of eight times with a .22 caliber pistol. Walsh had been stabbed more than 150 times. Their bodies were found in a 24-hour period Aug. 20-21, 1982.

Manske, of Yates Center, said after Smith's sentencing that he would appeal his client's convictions.

Waste sites unknown, expert says

By The Associated Press
LINCOLN, Neb. — Not all hazardous-waste sites in the United States are known, and the political structure isn't ready to handle the overall problem, a nationally known expert in environmental and occupational health says.

"Nobody knows where they are or how much there is," Dr. James Melius said.

Dioxin problems in Missouri and chemical waste dumps across the country have been well-publicized, but Melius said thousands of smaller hazardous waste problems are in the environment.

"These kind of incidents can occur in urban areas (or) in semi-urban areas," he said. "They can occur anywhere chemicals are stored or anywhere chemicals are moved. In most of the major incidents, there is no coordinated response initially."

In order to be prepared, Melius said states and communities must have a coordinated response team that can arrive at the site of a hazardous-waste emergency immediately.

Workers purchase steel factory

By The Associated Press
WEIRTON, W. Va. — Thousands of blue-collar workers at the giant Weirton steel plant became their own bosses Wednesday as documents were signed creating the nation's largest experiment in employee ownership.

About 10,000 workers now own the tin-plate mill where many of their fathers and grandfathers worked. The $386.1 million deal was financed largely with borrowed funds, but employees have agreed to cut their pay and benefits.

The sale became final Wednesday afternoon when Howard Love, chairman of the parent National Intergroup Inc., and Weirton Steel President Robert L. Loughhead signed the official agreement.

About 2,000 employees are still laid off, but an efficiency program has been worked out in hopes of bringing many of them back to work. For thousands still working, the buyout means a chance to save their jobs in a slumping industry where layoffs have been widespread.

"At least it gives the mill a future, a chance I guess I should say," steelworker Jerry Brozovich said Wednesday. "There is a certain amount of euphoria. We're entering ground that hasn't been broken before."

The new Weirton Steel becomes the largest employee-owned company in the United States.

Rank-and-file steelworkers were absent from the closing ceremony, which came shortly after the steel mill's second shift went to work at 4 p.m.

1983 open records bill

Legislators address mistake

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — In an effort to clean up a mess made last year, a proposal nearly identical to the 1983 open records law Wednesday was introduced in the Kansas House and lawmakers are expected to rush the measure through the lower chamber by the week's end.

The measure, introduced by the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, opens to public scrutiny many state records and generally broadens public access to government files.

A similar measure was passed into law by the 1983 Legislature, but a clerical error caused several words to be dropped from the official version signed by the governor, possibly invalidating the law now on the books.

"This is the correct version and it is, in essence, identical to the law we passed last year," said Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington and chairman of the Federal and State Affairs Committee. "We've replaced the line that was left out of last year's bill and hope to run it Friday."

The measure will be referred directly to the House for floor debate and tentative action Friday and a final vote will be taken Monday.

"We've assured people they'll have the opportunity to propose changes in the open records law later in the session," Miller said, explaining the hurried pace the bill was taking through the lower chamber. "We just want to get this to the governor as quickly as possible."

Even though the law currently on the books potentially is flawed, lawmakers and state officials consider it in force until the correct version replaces it.

Also introduced Wednesday was bill expanding the authority of auditors examining records and documents for the Division of Legislative Post Audit.

That bill would authorize auditors for the post audit, which is the watch-dog arm of the Legislature, to have access to all books, accounts, records, files and documents of businesses regulated or licensed by the state.

Miller said the bill was prompted by a confrontation last year between a state auditor and a private club in Topeka during an audit of the Alcoholic Beverage Control. The club refused to turn over its books and the audit was dropped because the law was vague, Miller said.

Among the other bills introduced were measures which:

— Give a variety of state regulatory boards and agencies the authority to charge the costs of unsuccessful hearings and civil court cases to businesses filing claims against the state boards. The authority to collect for adverse claims would be granted to: the veterinary licensing board, the behavioral science regulatory board, the state board of barber examiners, the optometry board and the state board of embalming. Other agencies, such as the Kansas Corporation Commission which regulates utilities in Kansas, already have that power.

— Abolish the Capitol Area Plaza Authority which supervises building development on and around the grounds of the statehouse, state office building and judicial building. Rep. Vic Miller, D-Topeka, said the approximately 12-member board is "worthless and a waste of time and money" and its duties could easily be assumed by the Department of Administration.

Court silences police, attorneys in former Kansans' grisly deaths

By The Associated Press

FORT WAYNE, Ind. — Police and attorneys involved in the case of a Fort Wayne teen-ager suspected of brutally murdering a local newspaperman and his family cannot issue any information on the case except through court documents, a judge ruled Wednesday.

Allen Circuit Court Judge Thomas L. Ryan issued the order in response to a motion filed by Barrie Tremper, the public defender representing 18-year-old Calvin D. Perry III of Fort Wayne.

Police have called Perry their "prime suspect" in the Sept. 19, 1983, bludgeoning deaths of Dan Osborne, 35, who was editorial page editor of the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel; his wife, Jane, 34; and the couple's 11-year-old son, Ben.

Perry has not been charged with those crimes. Allen County Prosecutor Stephen Sims has said it is "certainly a probability" that Perry will be charged.

Perry was ordered held in lieu of $200,000 bond after his arraignment Tuesday on charges he burglarized and beat a 78-year-old woman Jan. 5.

Police also said they believe Perry was involved in 13 other crimes, including rape, robbery and battery on the city's south side.

Tremper and Sims agreed Wednesday to postpone a morning lineup involving Perry until another attorney from the public defender's staff could arrive. Tremper said he wanted Charles Leonard to assist in Perry's defense, but Leonard said he had not yet decided whether to accept the case. The lineup was tentatively rescheduled for 1:30 p.m. Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Perry's father told the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel that he believes his son is capable of committing the crimes.

"To tell you the truth, Calvin might be involved in all the police say," said the elder Perry, who never married his son's mother and lives with his wife and three children elsewhere in Fort Wayne. "Over the years, I've seen a pattern develop in him that really leads me to question" whether he killed the Osbornes.

Researchers report AIDS findings

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Blood transfusions appear to cause about 1 percent of all AIDS cases reported so far, but the chances of getting the deadly disease from blood after an operation or accident are tiny, researchers say.

The new study also shows, however, that the disease may be spread by transfusions of less than a pint of contaminated blood, and that the donors of tainted blood may have no outward signs of the disorder.

An editorial published with the study in the Jan. 5 New England Journal of Medicine cautioned physicians to give transfusions and other blood products only when absolutely necessary.

"The risks of transfusions to those who need them are vastly outweighed by the benefits of receiving the transfusions," Dr. James W. Curran, who directed the study, said in an interview. "It's quite a small risk, but we now believe that it is a real one."

Since June 1982, doctors have identified 38 transfusion-associated cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome. This is about one-thousandth of 1 percent of the 3.2 million people who get blood transfusions in the United States each year.

Last March, the nation's blood bank organizations issued guidelines recommending those most likely to carry AIDS refrain from donating blood. The researchers said this should lower the risk of spreading the incurable disease through blood.

The latest study was done at the Centers for Disease Control.

About 88 percent of the 3,064 AIDS victims — of whom more than 1,200 have died — have been male homosexuals or drug addicts. Also at higher than usual risk are Haitian immigrants and hemophiliacs who receive blood clotting material.

However, 192 of the victims do not fit into any of these risk categories, and among them are people who developed AIDS after receiving blood.

Fugitive exports technology to Cuba

By The Associated Press

HAVANA — Short on oil and long on sugar, Cuba is looking for ways to convert miles of cane plantations into fields of energy. And U.S. investigators say the search has been led by Robert L. Vesco, the fugitive American financier.

American authorities say Vesco, reportedly given refuge here by President Fidel Castro, masterminded a sophisticated scheme to smuggle U.S. sugar-to-fuel technology into Cuba, a plan eventually broken up by U.S. Customs agents.

One alleged participant has been imprisoned in Texas, another reportedly was slain in Mexico, and a third is on the run. Vesco himself remains elusive, possibly holed up in the comfort of a yacht club outside Havana.

The case highlights Cuba's continued frustration with a U.S. trade embargo that has foiled its development efforts repeatedly over the past 23 years.

The Cubans will confirm only that they are interested in the forbidden oil-saving technology. As for Vesco, "I know absolutely nothing about him or where he is," Deputy Foreign Minister Ricardo Alarcon recently told The Associated Press, in a comment typical of official Cuban reaction to the U.S. reports.

The State Department, which had no comment on Cuba's sugar to energy plan, says it doesn't know where Vesco is.

Vesco fled the United States a decade ago after being charged with looting an investment firm, Investors Overseas Services, of $224 million, and has since resided in several Caribbean-area countries. He dropped from sight in 1982 after being expelled from Costa Rica.

If he or anyone else were able to deliver advanced sugar-cane "pelletization" technology to Cuba, it would be a boon to this economically struggling island, whose central plains are carpeted with cane plantations.

In pelletization, the bagasse — the moist fiber left after sugar is extracted from cane — is dried out and compressed into inch-long pellets that can be burned in boilers, to run turbines producing electricity.

"We have made an analysis, and bagasse would permit us to substitute for one million tons of fuel oil per year," Herminio Garcia Lazo, vice president of Cuba's Central Planning Board, said in a recent interview.

The Cubans now depend on Soviet oil — 12 million tons per year — for 75 percent of their energy needs.

The pelletizing system not only would make Cuba less of a burden for the Soviet Union, which sells oil to Cuba at half price, but also would make better use of sugar cane that now sells at world prices barely equal to production costs.

The technology includes not just the pellet-making machines, whose leading manufacturer is California Pellet Mills of San Francisco, but also a complex of electronic equipment, made by various U.S. firms, to control the difficult drying process.

The system was inaugurated in 1981 at the Theo H. Davies company's Hawaiian sugar plantations, which as a result now supply 15 percent of the island of Hawaii's electricity.

Norland L. C. Suzor, of the Dallas firm Syner-Tech, a key developer of the technology, says three tons of bagasse pellets produce as much energy as a ton of oil.

"Bagasse...offers a huge energy potential, especially to the many Third World countries where sugar cane is grown on a large scale," Suzor told the Third Latin America Bio-Energy Conference in Guatemala City last October.

In a telephone interview, Suzor said the Cubans had indirectly contacted Syner-Tech about buying the equipment but were rebuffed, since U.S.-made goods cannot be legally exported to Cuba.

The Cubans apparently then turned to Vesco and an elaborate scheme for circumventing the U.S. embargo, according to testimony at the November trial in Brownsville, Texas, of Salvador Ramirez Precido, one of the alleged participants.

A source at California Pellet Mills, who asked not to be identified, said his firm shipped two pellet machines to a Houston warehouse to fill the order of a Costa Rican company, Imbagua.

Meanwhile, the necessary electronic equipment, from four U.S. firms, was being ordered for delivery to a Chicago warehouse. The goods in Texas and Chicago were worth $729,000, said Jack Wolfe, assistant U.S. attorney in Brownsville.

The pellet machines were to be flown to Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula, to be picked up by another plane and taken to Cuba, Wolfe said. But on the night of last July 7, Customs agents acting on tips intercepted three men as they were transferring the pellet-making equipment to a jet at the Harlingen, Texas, airport.

Ramirez, 44, Alejo Qintero Peralta, 43, both of Mexico City, and Albert Anthony Volpe, 58, of Toronto, were charged with conspiring to violate the Trading with the Enemy Act. Federal court set bail of $100,000 each.

Within two days, Wolfe said, Vesco sent the bail money to Brownsville. Qintero fled to Mexico, where authorities later reported he was slain by his sister-in-law in a domestic quarrel, and Volpe apparently also left the United States.

Ramirez was convicted in early November and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

Officials at the U.S. diplomatic mission in Havana say they cannot confirm Vesco's presence here. But during the Brownsville trial government witness Richard Silvio Bettini, identified as a Vesco associate, said that during the planning for the pellet-machine scheme he had met with the runaway financier at a seaside home 45 minutes from Havana airport.

AT&T to distribute 'card caller' phones

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — American Telephone & Telegraph Co. announced an agreement Wednesday that will allow holders of American Express Co. cards to charge calls placed on AT&T's new "card caller" public telephones.

Calling charges would appear on the card holders' monthly American Express bill.

There are about 16 million American Express card holders. Financial terms of the agreement with American Express were not disclosed.

AT&T had announced late last year it would install as many as 5,000 of the phones in 1984. The phones also accept AT&T charge cards but do not accept coins.

Local, long distance and international calls can be placed on the phones.

Calls charged on the AT&T cards are itemized on customers' regular telephone bills.

MCI Communications Corp., an AT&T competitor, also announced late last year it had reached agreements for callers to use Visa and MasterCard credit cards with its new public telephones. MCI said there are about 120 million Visa and MasterCard holders who will be eligible to use its new phones, which also do not accept coins.

State reviews oral contraceptive suit

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Noted Wichita products liability lawyer Gerald Michaud Wednesday urged the state Supreme Court to uphold a $5 million damage award to a Lawrence woman whose kidneys failed after she took the oral contraceptive Ortho-Novum four years in the 1970s.

Michaud emphatically rejected contentions by the attorney for the pill's manufacturer, Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., that the award was excessive and the Sedgwick County District Court jury which heard the case should not have been permitted to award punitive damages.

The jury allowed Carol Lynn

Wooderson, who was 25 years old when her kidneys failed in 1976, $2 million in actual damages and $2.75 million in punitive damages.

David Dobbins, a New York City attorney who argued the case for Ortho before the Supreme Court, said that with interest the award now exceeds $5 million.

Ortho Pharmaceutical, a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson, appealed the verdict, seeking a new trial.

Under normal handling, the court would have a ruling in the case Feb. 18.

"It was one of the most horrendous injuries I've ever seen," Michaud told the Supreme Court. "I'm surprised the jury didn't award more."

Michaud said he has been involved in 350 products liability cases, and has won four of five brought against Ortho. He said this is one of the more serious he has handled.

"We weren't talking about losing a little hair...a minor side effect," he said. "We're talking about side effects that cause death."

He sued Ortho for Wooderson on grounds of inadequate testing of Ortho-Novum and inadequate warning about its side effects to doctors and patients. He told the court Ortho knew its contraceptive pill caused the membranes of organs and blood vessels to break down in some women but went on marketing it anyway.

He said Wooderson has incurred medical bills in excess of $220,000, has cataracts in both eyes, has lost both her kidneys, cannot have children and has an increased risk of developing cancer because of the medication she must take.

Michaud said Wooderson's body first rejected a kidney transplant from her brother, and was on a dialysis machine to purify her blood three times a week for more than five years and underwent 55 blood transfusions.

She once asked that she be allowed to die, the attorney told the court.

The Wichita jury agreed at the trial with Michaud's argument that Wooderson's acute kidney failure resulted from taking the contraceptive pills manufactured by Ortho from 1972 until 1976.

Report analyzes Kassebaum's votes

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sen. Nancy Kassebaum's backing for the informal coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats in Congress declined markedly in 1983, according to a computerized analysis of last year's recorded votes.

The support of the Kansas Republican for her party's position on party-line issues also declined slightly, while her backing for President Reagan rose a bit after declining in 1982.

Those indications came from an annual computerized tally of congressional votes compiled by the respected Washington journal Congressional Quarterly, which published its 1983 figures last week.

The most dramatic change was in support for the conservative coalition, the informal alliance of Republicans and southern Democrats which often emerges in congressional votes. Kassebaum supported the coalition on 80 percent of such votes in 1981 and 77 percent in 1982. But that figure dropped to 59 percent last year.

Kassebaum backed Reagan on 81 percent of the votes where the president had an announced position in 1981, his first year in office. That fell to 77 percent in 1982 and rebounded slightly to 78 percent last year.

Her record on party unity followed a similar track. She voted with Republicans 77 percent of the time in 1981 on issues where positions largely followed party lines. In 1982, her party unity score declined to 74 percent, and it hit 71 percent last year.

David Bartel, the senator's top aide, said the numbers show there has not been any major change in her voting patterns and may reflect a change in the mix of issues before Congress more than any ideological shift.

"Especially with the conservative coalition, you have to look at what issues come up. Some years they are more economic, some years social. She has often disagreed with the coalition on social issues like ERA (the Equal Rights Amendment) and abortion." Economic issues dominated the early part of Reagan's term, with many social issues not surfacing until last year.

Bartel also said the changes may also be indicative of a general drop in cohesiveness among Senate Republicans, who showed unusually high unity in 1981, the first year they had been the majority party in a quarter century.

Controversial Iranian convention cancelled

A controversial gathering of Iranian Muslims scheduled for last month was cancelled. The conference, sponsored by the Persian-Speaking Group, could have brought as many as 1,000 Iranians to Manhattan for three days beginning Dec. 26.

The conference was described by one pro-Khomeini source as an opportunity for all Iranian Muslims to discuss "Islamic laws and Islamic rules." This statement was contested by some anti-Khomeini students, who claimed the conference was actually a means for pro-Khomeini forces to conspire against anti-Khomeini factions.

According to a Dec. 9 Collegian article, arrangements made by the PSG began to fall through in early December. Manhattan High School, originally to be the site of the conference, became off-limits to the group when the district superintendent, James Benjamin, became concerned about a possible risk to the school grounds. He said he had already begun considering cancelling before he knew anything of the conflict.

Pottorf Hall in CCo Park also became unavailable to the group for meal preparation, as originally planned, because the first day of the conference fell on a county holiday, Jim Lindquist, director of Riley County Extension, said.

The group's reservations for 110 sleeping rooms at the University Ramada Inn were cancelled in mid-December. Dan Richards, the inn's operations manager, said.

"They never met the (payment) cutoff date of Dec. 12," Richards said. "We had to call them on the 12th — well, actually we called them on the 13th — to ask them about it."

Richards said the group's representative told him they couldn't find a place to have their meetings, so the conference was called off.

Experts' views split on facts about hair analysis for health

By JANET HELM
Contributing Writer

A relatively new procedure has emerged in the field of nutrition — analyzing strands of hair to determine a person's nutritional status.

Hair analysis, used by some chiropractors, health food store operators, mail-order companies, private "nutritionists" and practitioners of holistic medicine, is becoming a big business.

"It's definitely a procedure that everyone should have done," J.R. Cortner, Manhattan chiropractor and hair analyst, said. "You'd be amazed at the cases I've had that have been through every known test to science, and then had a hair trace and completely corrected their problem."

Cortner has been doing hair analysis for about nine years. For the $65 procedure, his customers must provide a sample of hair, preferably from the back of the neck. The actual analysis is performed in a laboratory in Phoenix, Ariz., called Biological Mineral Sciences, Ltd.

A brochure advertising the laboratory's services states that the hair is washed in detergent, then digested to a liquid. The residue is analyzed for mineral content. After the analysis, the laboratory produces a computerized printout indicating the client's mineral status. The evaluation reports deficiencies, excesses, abnormal ratios and toxic metal accumulations in the body.

A sample mineral evaluation from Cortner's office listed 27 abnormal conditions, such as diabetes, arthritis and heart attacks, that may result from the client's mineral status.

The report stated, "You may want to do additional testing to determine their presence (abnormal conditions)." It recommended 11 food supplements, as well as vitamin and mineral products, which Cortner sells.

Cortner said people with arthritis, severe insomnia, high blood pressure and gastro-intestinal problems come to his office for treatment. Their conditions are diagnosed and corrected through hair analysis, he said.

Many of the claims made by hair analysts, however, have not been substantiated by scientific research.

The American Medical Association Committee on Cutaneous Health and Cosmetics recently issued a statement concerning the abuse of hair analysis. It said the state of the body's health may be completely unrelated to the chemical condition of the hair.

Howard Bell also uses hair analysis in his nutrition practice in Raytown, Mo. Bell said he is a certified nutritionist with a master's degree in nutrition from Donsbach University — an unaccredited correspondence school in California. Bell also owns Bell's Family Supplements, which markets vitamin and mineral supplements in 85 outlets in Missouri and Kansas.

"The analysis of your hair is the scientific, yet natural approach to detect excesses and deficiencies," Bell said. "It is the guide to reversing the aging process."

Bell has been doing hair analysis for six years. His customers are requested to mail two tablespoons of hair from the nape of the neck and

A sample hair analysis report provided by Bell recommended 17 supplements, including bran tablets, garlic pearls, lecithin, copper tablets and aloe vera juice.

According to Bell's product catalog, the cost of the recommended products would total $193.45 for one gallon of the aloe vera juice and a 200-tablet supply of each of the 16 remaining supplements. The report recommended an additional hair analysis — at a cost of $36.95 — be completed four months after beginning the supplementation program.

"The application of hair analysis in a clinical practice to diagnose and prescribe treatments is the epitome of medical and nutritional quackery," Robert Reeves, associate professor in foods and nutrition, said. "A real tragedy exists when the public is subjected to the quasi-scientific methods used by unorthodox practitioners, and, as a result, delays proper medical care or begins a form of treatment that may be extremely harmful."

"At the present time, hair analysis must be considered an experimental technique with little or no value in a clinical practice setting," Reeves said. He said the procedure is limited because of the problems in methodology and data interpretation.

"For example, in man, normal values (for trace element concentrations in hair) have not been established, and little information exists regarding correlations between mineral content of hair and tissue levels," he said. "The data (for hair analysis) are 99 percent uninterpretable and cannot be used to make a diagnosis of a specific disease."

According to K. Michael Ham-bidge in a 1983 article in the National Institute of Health's "Research Resources Report," hair absorbs minerals from the environment, and it is difficult to know whether the trace elements came from the body and grew out with the hair or whether they came directly from the environment.

Hair treatments present a further problem, he said. Bleaching, dyeing and permanent waving, for instance, have been found to alter the concentrations of trace elements in the hair. Shampooing also must be taken into account since some brands have zinc or selenium additives. In addition, a person's age, sex and natural hair color affect hair composition, he said.

Hair analysis has been shown to have some use in the detection of excessive exposure to a number of toxic elements including arsenic, mercury and lead, Hambridge said.

Another valid use of hair analysis is the detection of protein malnutrition or kwashiorkor.

Meredith Smith, assistant professor in foods and nutrition, has used hair analysis when conducting nutrition surveys in Haiti, Mexico and Paraguay. The hair changes color (depigmentation), becomes very thin and sparse and can be easily plucked in protein malnutrition, she said.

"This (hair analysis) is a quick way for looking at the protein status of a child," Smith said.

Snow, bad tires cause bus mishap

A volunteer offers assistance to school children as they climb a steep embankment to board another bus for home.

By Staff and Wire Reports

A Junction City woman and one child were injured Thursday afternoon when a school bus carrying 14 children slid off the road and into a ditch.

Blenda M. Cill, driver of the bus, was taken to The St. Mary Hospital with shoulder injuries and is in stable condition, a hospital spokesman said.

Shane Melanie, passenger on the bus, was taken to Geary Community Hospital where she was treated for scalp lacerations and released, a hospital spokesman said.

The bus, transporting U.S.D. 485, Junction City, school children was northbound on Riley County Highway 901, 1½ miles north of Interstate 70. The bus slid into the right-side ditch. The accident occurred near the Riley and Geary County boundary line.

The two right rear tires on the bus were of "very poor quality" and had "no grip whatsoever," said Capt. Nick Edvy of the Riley County Police Department.

"They should have been replaced long ago. That probably had a lot to do with the accident. In fact, for that there can be tickets issued or a complaint filed," Edvy said.

Steve McCoy, a Kansas Highway Patrol trooper, said the highway patrol is responsible for inspecting state school bus tires each year prior to August.

The accident was only one of many caused by the poor weather conditions Thursday, Edvy said. Estimates on the total number of accidents were not available Thursday evening.

Four accidents occurred on campus, according to the K-State Police.

Three of the accidents caused damages estimated at more than $300, while damages of another amounted to less than $300. There were no injuries.

Accidents occurred on Clafin Road near Haymaker Hall, on Oak Drive, on the corner of Oak Drive and Vattier and on Campus Creek Road.

In addition, campus police assisted RCPD officers at a two-car accident on Denison Avenue next to Hollis House. The accident caused no injuries.

In Topeka, the National Weather Service reported that heavy snow fell across sections of northern Kansas Thursday, and strong northerly winds caused blowing and drifting snow in some areas which made traveling hazardous.

The National Weather Service said a weather observer at Centralia in northeastern Kansas reported that 7 inches of snow had fallen by mid-afternoon Thursday.

The Nemaha County Sheriff's Department at nearby Seneca estimated that 4 inches of snow fell there.

"It came down pretty heavy for quite some time," Dispatcher Mary Weaver said. She said roads in the area were snow-packed and slippery and that several cars had skidded off highways, but no major accidents were reported.

Riley County Police Lt. Robert Hudson fills out a report from inside a U.S.D. 485 school bus after it slid off Riley County Highway 901 and turned on its side. The bus was transporting 14 Junction City school children home when the accident occurred. The school bus driver and one student were injured.

Nicaragua denies guilt for death

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — The leftist Sandinista government acknowledged that its troops shot down a U.S. Army helicopter but denied Thursday the pilot was fired on after he landed in Honduras.

The Pentagon said the United States made an official protest, saying the pilot was shot and killed after he got out of the downed helicopter and holding Nicaragua responsible for his death.

In a communique Wednesday night, Nicaragua said it "deplores the incident" and blamed the pilot's death on the U.S. military presence in Central America. The statement said Sandinista troops shot at a helicopter inside Nicaraguan territory and it carefully avoided any admission that the Nicaraguans had killed the American.

On Thursday night, junta coordinator Daniel Ortega denied that Sandinista troops had fired at the pilot after he landed on a road on the Honduran side of the border.

"We cannot accept the version that the pilot was fired at on land," he said, repeating that Sandinista troops fired at the helicopter only when it was in Nicaraguan airspace.

He described the slain pilot as "a victim of United States political aggression in Central America."

President Reagan's spokesman denounced the fatal attack on the pilot as being "reckless and unprovoked."

Key presidential aides met to draft the U.S. response, which sources said could include possible military retaliation against the leftist Nicaraguan government.

As the government moved to make its protest known on several fronts, Larry Speakes, the spokesman, said Reagan condemned the attack.

The president called it "a great tragedy," Speakes said. Reagan offered his "deepest condolences" to the family of the pilot, Chief Warrant Officer Jeffrey C. Schwab of Joliet, Ill.

Sources who asked to be anonymous refused to disclose the specific military options being considered. Nor would they say who was proposing such a step.

Asked at a Pentagon briefing about possible military retaliation, Defense Department spokesman Michael Burch said, "I'm not aware of any military response."

U.S. to compete for sales

China begins nuclear age

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — American officials said Thursday they had made major progress toward an agreement with China that could open the way for U.S. firms to compete for an estimated $20 billion in sales of nuclear power technology, as Peking embarks on an ambitious program to develop atomic energy.

But the officials, briefing reporters at the White House following the departure of Chinese Premier Zhao Ziyang, cautioned that some "very tough" negotiations lie ahead if President Reagan is to sign an agreement on peaceful nuclear cooperation when he visits Peking in April.

"We are not going to make any deals just to further our commercial interests at the expense of our strategic and national security interests," one administration official pledged.

One aide said the United States was particularly pleased by a little-noticed policy statement on nuclear non-proliferation that Zhao included in his toast to Reagan at a state dinner in the White House on Tuesday night.

Zhao, whose government only recently joined the International Atomic Energy Agency and agreed to abide by its restrictions on exports of nuclear materials, said China remains "critical of the discriminatory treaty on non-proliferation of nuclear weapons."

"But we do not advocate or encourage nuclear proliferation," Zhao told Reagan. "We do not engage in nuclear proliferation ourselves, nor do we help other countries develop nuclear weapons."

A senior official said, "We very much welcome this statement of China's policy because it shows that we share certain basic principles on nonproliferation."

The United States, he added, has been concerned for some time that China, which has tested its own nuclear weapons, was "a significant source of nuclear technology for a number of countries that remain of nonproliferation concern, such as Argentina."

Hein points to enrollment figures as factor in allocations to K-State

Gov. John Carlin's recommendations to the Kansas Legislature for fiscal year 1985 operating expenditures at the Board of Regents institutions included a $12.6 million increase for K-State.

K-State Director of Communications Charles Hein said the increase can be attributed to enrollment figures, expanded research, extension units and public service, and needed capital improvements.

He said state appropriations for any given fiscal year depend in part on enrollment figures from two years prior. He said that since K-State experienced an increased enrollment last year, it was logical that the University would receive additional funds to operate with next year.

Hein identified a second reason for the increase as growth in certain programs at K-State. Such programs include "statewide research, extension units and public service."

Hein also said the governor recommended approximately $2 million for capital improvements at K-State. Such improvements include continuing renovation of Nichols Gymnasium, renovation of Weber Hall and financing relocation of the campus greenhouse.

The amounts associated with each institution are listed below. The first figure is the amount each institution was recommended to receive for the upcoming fiscal year. The second figure is the amount each institution is authorized to spend in the present year.

KU Medical Center — $164.7 million; $155.2 million.

K-State — $157.9 million; $145.3 million.

University of Kansas — $157.6 million; $149.9 million.

Wichita State University — $59.8 million; $56.8 million.

Fort Hays State University — $25.5 million; $24.1 million.

Emporia State University — $25.2 million; $24.4 million.

Pittsburg State University — $23.2 million; $22.9 million.

K-State Veterinary Medicine Center — $8.4 million; $8.1 million.

Kansas Technical Institute — $5.2 million; $4.4 million.

Committee asks for state employee benefits

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A proposal to establish a three-member commission to negotiate a long-term health care benefits contract for Kansas' 37,000 state employees was introduced Thursday in the Kansas House.

The bill, sponsored by the House Ways and Means Committee, is nearly identical to a measure which cleared both chambers of the 1983 Legislature but was shot down by Gov. John Carlin. The Democratic governor vetoed the bill because he was unhappy with the composition of the commission.

"The commission needs to get set up and start work on the next contract," said Rep. Bill Buntin, R-Topeka and chairman of the budget committee which introduced the bill. "It will be a long, difficult, time-consuming proposition hearing all the proposals that will be made."

"If we act quickly on this, they can start having meetings right away. They better have a recommendation by the first of August because that's when their current contract expires."

The commission would develop a package of health care insurance fringe benefits for state employees and it would have the power to negotiate a multi-year group insurance contract between the state and its employees.

The three members of the commission, according to the bill endorsed by Ways and Means, are the state Insurance Commissioner, the governor's Secretary of Administration and a member of the public appointed by Carlin.

Another proposal introduced Thursday would give the Kansas Corporation Commission authority to decide whether electric transmission lines requested by utilities are actually needed.

Rep. David Heinemann, R-Garden

City, said the bill corrects an oversight in the present electric transmission line siting act enacted in 1979 which only gave the commission power to decide the "reasonableness" of a power line request.

"This will allow the corporation commission to decide whether a power line is needed," Heinemann said.

The bill stems from a dispute between the commission and Kansas City Power and Light Co., a co-owner of the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant near Burlington.

In June of last year, the commission rejected KCPL's request to build a 57-mile transmission line from the power plant to a Johnson County sub-station after concluding the line was not necessary.

However, the Kansas Court of Appeals ruled in October the KCC did not have the authority to rule on necessity of a power line and overturned the commission decision.

Besides the commission, Don McGinnis, a Rantoul rancher, has fought the utility's plan to build the high-voltage line across his property in Anderson County.

Other bills introduced in the House would:

— Appropriate $6 million for operations at the Kansas Legislature in the fiscal year which starts July 1. About $5.7 million was appropriated by lawmakers last year to fund their own operations in the current fiscal year, which ends June 30.

— Authorize the state's 305 school districts to attach white flashing lights to school buses for use during dark, foggy or stormy conditions.

— Allow the state Board of Healing Arts decide whether a licensed dentist has the proper certification to administer general and local anesthetics to patients.

Spring enrollment count shows slight decrease

At the close of the regular spring semester registration period Tuesday afternoon, the number of students who had enrolled for on-campus classes was 220 below that of a year ago.

"This is an indication we've reduced the deficit which occurred last fall when we were 418 students below the previous year," William Feyerharm, assistant provost, said. "It appears we're returning more students this spring compared to last fall."

Feyerharm said on-campus enrollment as of Tuesday night was 14,675, compared with 14,895 a year ago.

"This would indicate an official spring enrollment of more than 17,000," he said.

Although the formal registration period ended Tuesday evening and classes started Wednesday morning, the official reporting date for Kansas Regents' institutions is the 20th day of classes, which this year is Feb. 7.

The official figure will include students enrolling late (but by Feb. 7), as well as students who enroll for late afternoon, evening and off-campus classes. Late registration for on-campus classes began Wednesday morning. Registration for late afternoon and evening classes began Wednesday evening and will continue through Tuesday. Registration for off-campus classes is also underway.

Faculty, staff semifinalists chosen

Names of 18 K-State employees have been announced as semifinalists for the 1984 K-State Classified Employee of the Year. Sixty-two faculty and staff were nominated to be considered in this selection. There are about 1,800 classified employees at the University. The 18 semifinalists represent 1 percent of the total eligible employees.

The individuals were selected by the K-State Classified Affairs Committee (CAC), coordinators of the classified employee recognition program.

The group of semifinalists will be narrowed to six finalists in mid-January. The recipient of the $500 award will be announced at a ceremony March 22.

Kohl Memorial Fund established

Larry Kohl, who earned degrees in 1968 and 1970 from K-State, has been memorialized by his family and friends. Kohl died in February 1983 at the age of 36. The Larry Kohl Memorial Scholarship Fund has been established in his name.

Kohl, formerly of Wichita, graduated from K-State in 1968 with a bachelor's degree in animal sciences and received a master's degree in animal physiology and reproduction in 1970. At the time of his death he was a resident of Vacaville, Calif., where he had recently been promoted to the rank of major in the U.S. Air Force.

Scholarships from the fund will be awarded for a period of 15 years to students majoring in animal sciences and industry. Preference will be given to students with an emphasis in sheep studies. Recipients will also be native Kansans.

Japanese film local prairie for TV

K-State's Konza Prairie Research Natural Area south of Manhattan was featured recently on a 25-minute Japanese television program.

Lloyd Hulbert, professor of biology in charge of the 8,616-acre preserve said the film crew likened their program to CBS's '60 Minutes' although their entire show was devoted to one topic. Hulbert said Japanese interest in Konza Prairie developed about a year ago when two reporters from a leading Japanese newspaper spent a Sunday afternoon at the site.

Hulbert recently received a copy of the Japanese TV program on which he is interviewed. Japanese sub-titles carried the gist of Hulbert's remarks to Japanese viewers.

Donor supports cancer research

Jeanne Schroeder of Lorraine has contributed $1,000 to help support cancer research and student cancer research at K-State.

The gift was given in memory of her husband, Paul Schroeder, and will be added to a memorial fund established in his name.

The donor is a member of the Cancer Research and Education Advisory Council that meets annually at K-State to provide advice and support to students and faculty scientists.

The K-State student cancer research fellowship program is funded entirely by contributions from private and corporate donors. Their donations provide cancer research opportunities to undergraduate students who plan a career in health-related occupations.

A fund-raising and public awareness program for the cancer research center was initiated in 1980 by a joint effort between the KSU Foundation and the Division of Biology.

Officials probe death of two-star general

By The Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO, Texas — A two-star general found hanging in a stairwell may have bound his own hands and committed suicide after pinning a note to himself saying he had been "sentenced and executed" for "crimes by the U.S. Army," the FBI said Thursday.

But a friend said Army Reserve Maj. Gen. Robert G. Ownby was a "perfect father and husband" who never would have taken his own life, and a Pentagon spokesman in Washington said senior reserve officers were being told to take precautions.

Ownby's body was found Wednesday morning suspended in a second-story stairwell at a headquarters building at Fort Sam Houston, said FBI agent Pat Cowley. His hands had been tied behind him with a military web belt and there was a noose around his neck.

A typewritten note pinned to his sweater read, "Captured, tried, convicted of crimes by the U.S. Army against the people of the world. Sentenced and executed."

Ownby's glasses and jacket, both folded, were found on a landing nearby beneath his wallet, and there was no sign of violence or foul play, the FBI said. Pentagon officials said the note could have been "a diversion" and that Ownby, commander of the 90th U.S. Army Reserve Command, could have committed suicide or been murdered.

"The possibility of the victim having placed the belt around his own wrists has not been ruled out," said an FBI statement.

The FBI said Ownby, 48, had left a handwritten note in his second-floor office saying that he had "apparently startled" some unidentified people in the building and was going to investigate.

Federal authorities initially feared Ownby's death could be attributed to terrorists, but Cowley said late Wednesday that the possibility had been ruled out. Earlier, however, the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service issued an alert to border points.

Blood was found on the general's body, but the FBI quoted Bexar County Medical Examiner Vincent DiMaio as saying the blood could have dripped from Ownby's nose and mouth during the hanging.

DiMaio ruled asphyxiation by hanging as the cause of death, telling the FBI that the general had no "preliminary marks or bruises indicating a struggle."

Chrysler files antitrust suit to halt GM, Toyota accord

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Chrysler Corp. today filed an antitrust lawsuit in its ongoing battle to block the proposed joint car-making venture between General Motors Corp. and Toyota Motor Corp.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court, claims the project would allow GM, the world's No. 1 automaker, and Toyota, the third-largest in sales, to "have a devastating effect on competition in the automobile market."

"These two giant manufacturers now will be able to set prices and product development, and to discuss costs, suppliers, sales and marketing strategies, design and technology, if the joint venture is allowed to stand," said Richard Goodyear, vice president and general counsel for Chrysler. "We believe it violates the nation's antitrust laws."

The proposed joint venture has been given tentative approval by the Federal Trade Commission. Chrysler has petitioned the FTC to release documents the commission used in making its decision.

The FTC on Dec. 22 voted 3-2 in favor of a proposed consent agreement allowing GM and Toyota to build up to 250,000 cars per year at an idle GM assembly plant in Fremont, Calif. The public has 60 days in which to comment on the decision.

Regents alter fees; grads to pay more

A policy recommendation on how to assess fees for graduate students was among the topics discussed at a meeting of the Council of Business Officers of the seven Kansas Board of Regents institutions Thursday in the Union.

The discussion was prompted by a change made last June in how the regents set the fees for the 1983-84 academic year. For the first time the regents differentiated between the fees that should be assessed for graduate and undergraduate students.

In the past, there has been a differentiation between fees for students in the College of Veterinary Medicine and students in other colleges, just as there are differences in fee assessment for residents and non-residents.

The regents set the rates for resident graduates at $490 a semester and $450 for undergraduates. Non-resident undergraduates pay $1,290 for tuition and graduate students pay $1,415.

The council also recommended a policy for deciding who is classified as an undergraduate student and who is not.

The council decided that students who have completed an undergraduate degree and have been accepted in a graduate program should be assessed graduate student fees for all classes being taken.

"It was the desire of the committee to get away from charging students course by course," Daniel Beatty, vice-president of business affairs, said.

This policy will not affect the individual with an undergraduate degree who returns to college to take a course for fun or interest and does not enroll in a graduate program. In that case, undergraduate fees will be charged for undergraduate courses and graduate fees for graduate courses, Beatty said.

It also was decided that graduate deans at the regents institutions will develop the policy for assessing students who are classified as special students and have not been accepted into a graduate program because of a technicality or a deficiency in courses.

Aid to El Salvador hinges on voter support

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — United States voters won't support extensive aid to Central America unless the recipient countries are held accountable on human rights issues, U.S. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said Thursday.

"It is absolutely inexcusable for any government to tolerate or allow mass murders" such as those reported in El Salvador, Skelton said in a speech to the Wichita Area Chamber of Commerce Congressional Action Breakfast.

Central America will continue to be of prime concern for the next decade because of its "tinderbox" countries that could have squabbles that would affect the U.S., Skelton said.

Holding countries to a "high moral standard" is essential, Skelton said. "Otherwise, I don't think you'll have the American people agreeing" to much aid to Central America.

Skelton, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, also continued his campaign against duplication and waste in the military.

"I think we would be much better off if those in the military could prune a bit, stop the duplication and come forward with their recommendations in a much more frugal manner. This, of course, is a tall order," Skelton said.

Skelton said the armed services could combine tasks such as administrative chores and training. He said he backs the idea of a military test center where weapons being developed and those already available can be tested for all branches of the military.

President Reagan won't get the 13 percent increase in military spending he wants, but a 5.5 to 6 percent annual growth in the defense budget would be reasonable, Skelton said. That would be a steady, predictable increase the military could count on, he said.

"If the money is spent well, we can get by on far less than a 13 percent increase," Skelton said.

City prepares to celebrate King's birthday

A celebration to commemorate Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday will be held at 6:30 p.m. Sunday at the Douglass Center Annex, 901 Yuma St. Songs, poetry, art displays, films, literature and keynote speakers will be featured.

The event, which is free and open to the public, will be highlighted by addresses from Dr. Gilbert Parks, a Topeka psychiatrist, and Philip Royster, associate professor of English.

Nancy Martin, assistant coordinator for the Manhattan Steering Committee of Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Program, said she believes the turnout Sunday will be larger than at last year's celebration because of a bill passed by Congress declaring the slain civil rights leader's birthday a national holiday.

"Last year was the first year for the celebration, and I'm hoping for a better turnout this year, that is, if the weather doesn't interfere," Martin said.

Druse shell Beirut as talks begin

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Druse gunners shelled Beirut's port and the Christian sector Thursday, and U.S. Middle East envoy Donald Rumsfeld began talks with Syrian leaders in Damascus on how to ease tensions in Lebanon.

Syrian-backed Druse leader Walid Jumblatt, meanwhile, issued new conditions for approving a plan to separate Lebanon's warring militias.

Government-run Beirut radio said six people were injured as shells fired from Druse-controlled mountains fell on Ashrafieh, the downtown area of Christian east Beirut.

Shells also struck around the Defense Ministry building in suburban Yarzeh, east of the capital, and at Beirut's port.

A spokesman for the Druse Progressive Socialist Party said the gunners opened up after Alek, a major Druse town in the Aley Mountains east of the capital, was shelled at mid-afternoon.

It was the first shelling of Yarzeh, the port and east Beirut since Lebanon's warring factions agreed in Damascus on Dec. 16 to put residential areas and public facilities off limits for fighting.

Rumsfeld and Foreign Minister Abdel-Halim Khaddam met in the Syrian capital of Damascus. There was no immediate word on details of the talks. The former U.S. defense secretary also is expected to meet with Syrian President Hafez Assad, who is recuperating from a heart ailment.

In Washington, Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Thursday he expected the Rumsfeld-Assad meeting would take place this weekend.

Reagan's speech to stress realistic terms with Russia

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's speech next week on U.S.-Soviet relations is intended to let the Soviet Union know that "we are determined to maintain a realistic and productive relationship," a White House spokesman said Thursday.

Larry Speakes, the spokesman, said Cabinet members, other present and former government officials and members of Congress are being invited to the White House East Room for the address that Reagan will deliver at 10 a.m. EST Monday.

The speech will be beamed live to European audiences by satellite. That, and the timing of the address to coincide with evening newscasts in Europe, indicated that Reagan intended to review his policies not only for Americans and the Soviets but for Western Europe allies who are installing new, improved U.S. medium-range missiles on their soil.

The address will be delivered two days before Secretary of State George P. Shultz is to meet with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko in Stockholm, Sweden.

State of education

Gov. John Carlin, in his State of the State address Tuesday, declared education to be a top priority facing the 1984 Kansas Legislature. Carlin's recognition of education as an important issue may be the first step in solving problems in the Kansas educational system.

One of Carlin's proposals was an across-the-board salary increase for primary and secondary teachers. Teacher's salaries are notoriously low. A beginning teacher's salary in Kansas averages $13,860, while accountants earn $19,212, civil engineers collect $20,640 and chemical engineers receive $26,568.

More money is not a total solution. Better salaries may attract or keep better teachers, but will not improve poor teachers.

Carlin also recommended use of the National Teacher Exam for initial certification. Competency testing could be a useful tool. No one should be allowed to teach without knowing the basics of reading, writing and math. However many of the qualities which make a good teacher cannot be measured by any test.

A one-year internship in a teaching position was another proposal. Carlin suggested completion of this internship as a qualification for certification.

Education majors are already required to do student teaching before graduation, but Carlin's proposal would increase the length of student teaching from less than one semester to one year. The internship could serve to identify and weed out poor teachers.

Any one of Carlin's proposals would not have a markedly positive effect on the Kansas educational system. Together, however, each balances the weakness of the others.

Carlin seems to have realized that cutting funds for education is the wrong way to solve the state's economic problems. After all, better educated people will attract new industry to Kansas. The governor is making an effort to improve the educational system. What remains to be seen is whether or not the legislature will support him.

Funding coliseum raises question of priorities

When I first learned of the possibility of K-State building a new basketball coliseum, what first came to mind were several questions concerning the rationale for supporting such a project — who promotes the project and who will pay for it. After absorbing the information provided by radio and newspapers, I arrived at several conclusions.

There is no logical or defensible rationale for such a project, especially in light of the real and severe financial crisis now facing education in general and K-State in particular.

Those actively organizing and supporting the campaign tend to be K-State alumni and the University administration, with the major efforts being made at the upper levels of the administration.

The reason I have not included students as active supporters is that there is no student organization initiated and directed by students for the purpose of promoting the campaign, and also because most of the students now attending K-State never cast a vote on the coliseum issue. Thirdly, because the ballot was passed by students before by no means indicates lack of dissenters within the student body.

The methods of financing the project concerned me for several reasons. Initially the Board of Regents was approached for financial aid for the coliseum. The regents oversee allocations of educational monies, but the coliseum project was determined to be lacking sufficient educational value to receive their aid.

Students were approached for aid, and they obliged by voting themselves and future K-State students a fee increase totalling over $100 for students who pay fees for the standard eight-semester period. The remainder of the support was to come from alumni, faculty and other donors.

The question of athletics vs. education may seem to have a rhetorical air, but rarely can one see such a clear example of this conflict. Athletics are an important part of an educational experience, but not nearly as important as education itself. To say that a $20 million coliseum would not provide any educational value would be false. But to say that education will benefit more from the presence of a coliseum than if the money were spent closer to the classroom is an absurdity.

The arguments for and against large athletic expenditures are old, but let's review them and apply them to this specific instance.

It is said that a better athletic facility will result in a better athletic program, which will attract more students to the university. If this is so, then students should ask themselves, "Did K-State's athletics play a significant role in my choosing to attend this University?"

Is it desirable to have students in attendance who have based their decisions on an athletic program, or is it more desirable to have students who choose to attend because of the institution's academic excellence?

There are those who lay great credit for a university's success on its athletics. But how has the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or the University of Chicago survived without a dominating athletic program?

To dramatize the points made above, perhaps we should ask two hypothetical questions:

In which case would K-State be most improved: spending $20 million to raise salaries of current instructors and to recruit and retain a greater share of the world's foremost scholars and educators, or by spending $20 million on a coliseum?

Again, in which case would education and K-State most benefit: spending $20 million on educational facilities (a new and expanded library facility is a sound example), or spending $20 million on a coliseum? True, there is a tentative plan for library improvements to be funded by the regents several years from now, but which has been given higher priority and will be constructed first?

I am not opposed to spending money on athletics, but it must be maintained in a proper perspective. Considering this approach, what is wrong with renovating Ahearn Field House? Costs of such a project have been estimated at $6 million, $14 million less than the coliseum estimate.

Proponents of the coliseum argue that Ahearn's seating capacity would be too small. True, the current seating would be slightly diminished, but will K-State need a 15,000 to 17,000 seat coliseum? Isn't it better to have a loud sold-out house than 2,000 or 3,000 empty seats? And isn't student enrollment projected to decline in the coming years?

Another point made by proponents is the possibility of using the coliseum for lectures and concerts. Yet when was the last time the Union Program Council sold out a major concert at K-State?

Coliseum supporters also point to the parking problems associated with Ahearn Field House events. Wouldn't it be wiser to renovate Ahearn for $6 million and use some of the remaining $14 million to build a multi-level parking structure west of Memorial Stadium? This could solve many of the campus's daily parking problems.

One interesting aspect of the coliseum fund drive worthy of a glance is the incentives used to recruit donors for the project. The donations are tax deductible, and large donors can have a portion of the coliseum or the coliseum itself embossed with their name.

While these incentives are to promote a good and generous act, let us also look at the generosity of the student. Today's typical K-State student is paying for the coliseum without ever actually voting on the subject, and will most likely not receive a tax deduction on the $100-plus donation. The student will also make the donation anonymous.

If building a $20 million coliseum is not an absurdity, then what would be so ridiculous about naming it "Students Stadium" after its largest single block of contributors? Or perhaps a plaque should hang in the lobby inscribed with the names of all the students who contributed more than $100 in the name of higher education.

Student funding for the project wouldn't be so markedly wrong if it were done on a voluntary basis or if students were given a choice as to where the $16.50 per semester would go. Why shouldn't the student be given the choice of having the extra fee go to library improvements or to his or her college?

If higher education is to be "higher education," then close consideration must be given to properly arranging our priorities. These priorities should be directed toward achieving the best possible education for those who are to solve the world's problems in the future. At times policies and good intentions become misdirected and prevent an institution from achieving its full potential in the areas in which it was intended to excel.

Likewise, the proposed coliseum needs to be re-evaluated and studied in terms of its role in this University setting. When an institution of any type formulates major policy decisions it must rationally justify these policies if it is to reach its highest possible level of excellence. Perhaps we, as a part of the educational community, should re-evaluate our organizational goals and the paths we will choose in order to realize these goals.

It is the extracurricular activities which give an institution its distinct flavor or spice. However, we must realize that it is the healthy institution which allows for the existence of these appendages and not the reverse.

A pro-choice response: uncovering contradictory right-to-life attitudes

EDITOR'S NOTE: This column presents the opposite view than the one presented in "Abortion: an unnecessary evil," written by last semester's editorial page editor, Brad Gillispie, and printed Dec. 5, 1983.

The debate over abortion concerns human rights — the basic, constitutionally guaranteed right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. But the two opposing sides in this heated battle — pro-life and pro-choice — have markedly different interpretations of the right to life.

Pro-lifers declare the unborn fetus has just the same right to life as any breathing human, and these rights should be revered over the very rights of the woman whose body supports the fetus.

The pro-choice approach, however, considers the woman's right to life to include reproductive freedom — when she, instead of society and its laws, chooses how her body is used for procreation — and recognizes woman's right to life as paramount to that of the fetus.

Gillispie's column in the next-to-last issue of the fall semester Collegian advocated the pro-life argument. Theoretically his arguments represent typical pro-life attitudes. My reply advocates pro-choice.

DETERMINING WHEN LIFE begins is hardly an issue when considered against a woman's right to reproductive freedom. In arguing that life begins at conception, Gillispie wrote that the fetus should be given the benefit of the doubt because "he is a living human being at conception." This implies that the he-child should not be sacrificed, no matter what financial, temporal, mental and physical health consequences the pregnancy, birth and support of the child would entail for the woman. I question whether Gillispie and the pro-lifers would argue so adamantly for a female fetus.

The benefit of the doubt should be afforded the woman, not the fetus. Logically, any person with a vested interest in society and who has contributed to society is worth far more than an unborn fetus isolated in the womb, devoid of thoughts and ideas. This person, the woman, not the fetus, should be afforded foremost the protection, concern and benefits of society.

This society should not consider women its broodmares — engaged only in passive service to perpetuate a primarily male realm. Women should be valued for their intelligence, creativity, intuition, strength, ideas and thoughts — the same criteria by which men are judged.

Our male-dominated society has far too long — nearly our complete history — considered the female as a non-resistant breeder whose primary concern is birthing and rearing children. Instead, women should be valued for their intellectual and cultural contributions as well as their reproductive ones.

Actually, our male-dominated culture is contradicting its premise of human rights by attempting to usurp women's rights to reproductive freedom.

After all, as the elderly woman taxi driver in Boston said, "If men could get pregnant, abortion would be a sacrament."

THE MOST SIGNIFICANT legal action for women's rights since the passage of female suffrage, the 1973 Supreme Court decision Roe vs. Wade, declared that anti-abortion laws violated a woman's and her doctor's constitutional right to privacy. Members of the right-to-life movement were irate when the high court handed down this decision, and since then have worked vigorously to destroy the right to abortion.

Passage of the 1976 Hyde Amendment prohibited Medicaid-funded abortions for poor women. The right-to-lifers consider this act a major moral victory, but actually it may abuse the quality of life as much as pro-lifers claim abortion does.

Gillispie wrote that "there are many live births which result from attempted abortions." In his zeal to defend the unborn, he ignores possible physical injury to the woman. In fact, many deaths have resulted from abortion, and the woman was the victim.

Before Roe vs. Wade made abortion legal, women are known to have died from coathanger and other improperly performed abortions, as well as being forced to accept sterility as the price for abortion.

Having deprived indigent women of a reliable source of funding for what are often — in the interest of economic considerations — necessary abortions, the Hyde Amendment imposes a financial constraint that further erodes a woman's reproductive freedom. Women in poverty who do not wish to bear a child, especially if they already support others, out of ignorance may risk their own health if they cannot afford a legal abortion.

Legislating reproduction gives society control of women's bodies, and as such should not be allowed. Women have the right to control their bodies — to use contraception, carry a child or have an abortion when circumstances require.

IT IS NOT EASY to carry a child. But society expects women to enjoy the nine-month gestation and feel "blessed" for being pregnant.

But if a woman cannot properly carry out her own life if she becomes pregnant, she has the right to choose what is best for her at that particular time.

Some women are able to carry a fetus full term and opt to keep the child. Others may feel it best to give the child for adoption, but for some, the best alternative is abortion. It is essential that a woman be more important to society than the fetus impregnated in her body.

Gillispie wrote, "But one person's right to happiness cannot be greater than another's right to life itself."

An unwanted pregnancy creates great stress and anxiety. Women may not be happy and carefree after aborting a fetus. They may feel frustrated, confused and hurt. But Gillispie's statement is false. He neglects the woman's right to life: her right to life is inherently greater than the fetus' right to life.

Furthermore, Gillispie implied that the woman who has aborted a fetus insisted on engaging in the sexual activity that created it, and as such has "challenged the laws of nature."

BUT IT TAKES TWO to tango. The woman may not have been at fault, but she is the first to be blamed. Instead, both men and women should be equally responsible for the sexual act and its result. One great injustice in society is that women have traditionally borne the consequences for reproduction, both for society's sake and in the name of God.

I question whether some churches really practice Christianity when they expect women to forsake their own health and happiness to bear children, ignoring individual rights and interests.

KECIA STOLFUS
Editorial Page Editor

Gillispie's next argument began, "Abortion stems from a lowering of the value of human life." Actually, allowing the right to abortion preserves the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness of women and shifts the focus on "the value of human life" to the female half of the population.

Gillispie's claim that "there are many children, elderly and severely handicapped people who do not contribute as much to society as they get out of it," is totally unfounded and is proof of the anti-humanitarian position right-to-lifers espouse. Each of these three groups contribute and have contributed in numerous ways to society and this should not be discredited. To compare children, the elderly and the handicapped to unborn fetuses also degrades them more than society has already done.

This is a social injustice in the same manner that the phrase "women and children" successfully equates a woman's mental level with that of a child's.

GILLISPIE'S REMARKS further that these three groups "have the same constitutional rights as the most productive person alive." Doesn't this include women? In such a connotation Gillispie contradicted his own arguments. He has degraded women, but at the same time implied by association with children, elderly and handicapped that women have constitutional rights and should be protected.

It is also interesting to note, because pro-lifers are fond of accusing their pro-choice opponents of permitting another holocaust (but this time of unborn fetuses instead of Jews), a few words from Adolph Hitler's book "Mein Kampf":

"We must do away with the conception that the treatment of the body is the affair of every individual."

We know the result of Hitler's ideals; I doubt if further explanation is necessary to understand that advancing not only the pro-life cause but the unjust society it serves ultimately deteriorates individual rights and leads to persecution.

Gillispie's arguments espouse the very ideals he is guilty of oppressing:

"Any (moral) issue which puts the rights of one person against the rights of another is a moral issue... Abortion must be banned by law. If not, our lax attitudes toward the sanctity of human life will continue to deteriorate, and with them, our rights."

Whose "lax attitudes?" The pro-life movement has already demonstrated their weak attitudes in their degradation of women. But just as hypocritical is their attitude toward the child the fetus becomes at birth.

Right-to-lifers demonstrate a remarkable ability to organize, campaign, rally and raise funds in support of the unborn fetus. But surprisingly enough, this support ceases at birth. When the fetus becomes a child, it is no longer deemed worthy of consideration.

THIS IS THE MOST valid argument for abortion and points out the basic ailment of a society that generates such a conflict:

America's 64 million children are continually deprived and abused by society. Children are not universally loved. Assuming childhood to be a blissful, nurtured time of fun and adventure is a false conception. According to the 1983 book by feminist writer Letty Cottin Pogrebin, "Family Politics," children experience society's evils in detrimental fashion:

— They are uneducated: one million school-age children are not enrolled in school and 13 percent of America's 17-year-olds are functionally illiterate.

— They are poor: one in five are, and one in two black children are poor. Besides leading to malnutrition (often preceded by prenatal undernourishment) and academic and disciplinary problems, poverty increases seven times the risk of death in childhood.

— They are malnourished: federal nutrition programs do not adequately provide for children's needs. Pogrebin quotes Bob Greenstein, a former U.S. food and nutrition administrator, as having said, "The Reaganites want to give children prayers in school, but not breakfast."

— Youths are unemployed: the unemployment rate for black youth was nearly 50 percent in 1982 and 20 percent for white youth.

— They are ill-cared for: more American infants die at birth than those of 15 other countries. There are more than 11 deaths per 1,000 live births — and among blacks the number is nearly double.

As these facts indicate, our male-dominated society seems not to have learned a reverence for life, and for pro-life advocates to take such a stand contradicts themselves, because the attitudes they sponsor are inherently life-disdaining.

THE PRO-LIFE ATTITUDE is supported by the elite far right — elite in that their views apply only to and better only their own interests. This is where their favorite abortion alternative argument comes in: adoption.

The right-to-lifers always claim there are many couples waiting to adopt, but I ask: Are there adoptive parents for every unwanted malnourished minority child born in poverty?

Reality is a priority consideration in this debate. Advocating only a volatile statement thinly disguised as a noble ideal is no way to win an argument.

Gillispie argues that "...even if the fetus is dependent on the mother, she cannot be given the right to put the baby to death at her convenience."

These are harsh words meant to scare and intimidate. But women (and their men) should remember first and foremost their own personal contributions to society other than reproduction and how these would be affected by giving birth to a child.

Orwell predicts cruel world

By MICHELE SAUER
Campus Editor

1984 is here and after only two weeks of the new year, the public has been deluged with George Orwell TV and radio specials, Orwell magazine and newspaper articles and the news that bookstores all over the country cannot keep Orwell's novel "1984" in stock.

Orwell predicted and warned about a terrible world of totalitarianism, where three empires are constantly at war. In his 1984, man knows no privacy, freedom or joy.

Most people agree that Orwell's 1984 is not like the real 1984 — but it could be a warning for the future.

Analysis

However, Orwell predicted some aspects of the real 1984 fairly accurately.

Winston Smith is awakened every morning in the novel by a whistle, summoning him to do exercises in front of his telescreen. A woman drills him through calisthenics with a military harshness. Is this unlike Jane Fonda who counts out exercises, or the Jazzercise TV program? And just like the exercise leader in the novel, they know when you're not keeping up. "Keep going, keep going and a one-two-three-four," they urge.

The masses in Orwell's 1984 buy Victory gin and Victory cigarettes, which are inexpensive and inferior products. The cigarettes fall apart as Winston attempts to smoke them. Victory brand is similar to today's generic goods. Generic products, which are inexpensive and cheaply made, are widely popular today.

Sometimes there is a shortage of razor blades or shoelaces or chocolate in the novel, and the masses fight and pay outrageous prices to obtain these items. Today people don't fight for razor blades, but for Cabbage Patch dolls.

Residents of Oceania, the empire where Winston lives, are forced to be loyal to Big Brother, the leader of the Inner Party. Any person who is caught working or thinking against the party is sought out and erased from existence. Members of the Inner Party would remove any proof that the person ever existed.

Orwell's Police Patrol use helicopters to hover outside people's windows and spy on them. On Jan. 6, ABC premiered a series about a futuristic police helicopter, "Blue Thunder."

The helicopter, a 1973 French Aerospatiale Gazelle, is equipped to stop crime. CBS is also planning a helicopter adventure, "Airwolf", about international intrigue.

The Records Department in the novel supply the masses with literature, music, drama and entertainment.

"Here were produced rubbishy newspapers, containing almost nothing except sport, crime and astrology, sensational five-cent novelettes, films oozing with sex and sentimental songs which were composed entirely by mechanical means on a special kind of kaleidoscope known as a verisifier," the book states.

Similar newspapers and novelettes can be found in many stores and newstands today. Warnings to parents at the beginning of a growing number of movies could be seen as a trend towards the types of films available in Orwell's 1984. The verisifier sounds suspiciously like a synthesizer and other equipment which is used today to produce electronic music.

Another activity for the proles (proletariat) in the book is the lottery.

"The Lottery, with its weekly pay-out of enormous prizes, was the one public event to which the proles paid serious attention. It was probable that there were some millions of proles for whom the Lottery was the principle, if not the only, reason for remaining alive."

More than half of the states in America currently have some kind of legal gambling, whether it be casinos, para-mutuel betting or lotteries to raise tax revenues for the state.

Ag official defends PIK in Congress

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A man called "the father of the payment-in-kind program" defended the program Thursday at a joint meeting of the Kansas House and Senate agriculture committees.

"I had a little bit to do with the PIK program," William Leshner, assistant secretary of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, told lawmakers. "It was the right program at the time. It put a lot of money in farmers' pockets. It saved many rural communities."

Leshner said the program has increased prices for farm products, decreased farm program costs and, except for wheat, decreased grain surpluses.

But the wheat surplus has held steady with the PIK program, he said. The program provided government grain surpluses to farmers who reduced the number of acres they had in production.

Leshner echoed a statement U.S. Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., made before the agriculture committees Wednesday that the chances are less than 50 percent that Congress and President Reagan will make the 1984 wheat program more economically attractive to farmers.

"I could say there's a chance but there's not," he said, noting only 45 working days are scheduled for the 1984 Congress.

But Leshner urged farmers "not to dismiss the '84 wheat program."

"It will pay the average farmer to participate," he said.

BJP. Lee Hamm, D-Pratt, took issue with Leshner's statement that the PIK program has given everyone concerned with farm programs "some breathing space" to come up with a long-term agricultural policy.

"A lot of farmers are still in trouble," Hamm said. "I think 1984 is a crisis year for some farmers."

Leshner said federal farm programs, while not able to help everyone, did help good managers.

"There's always going to be some that go out of business," he said. "I don't think there's enough money in the Treasury to keep the 2.2 million farmers in business today in business tomorrow."

Leshner, who Glickman described Wednesday as the father of the PIK program, called it "a short-term fix."

"Quota allotment is not good for agriculture in the long term," he said.

Time increases impact of '1984'

George Orwell is the pen name of Englishman Eric Blair.

He was born in Bengal, a region in the northeast Indian peninsula in 1903 and educated in England at Eton. After serving with the Indian Imperial Police in Burma, he returned to Europe to earn his living writing novels and essays.

Orwell was essentially a political writer who wrote of his own times. He hated totalitarianism and served in the Loyalist forces in the Spanish Civil War. He was critical of communism but considered himself a Socialist.

Much of "1984" was written while Orwell was suffering from a lung ailment from which he eventually died at age 47. Only 25,500 copies of the book were first published, but five months after his death and a year after first publication the book had sold more than 200,000 copies.

His other most famous work was "Animal Farm."

State agricultural officers named

TOPEKA — A Cherokee County grain and soybean farmer, Alvin Epler, on Thursday was elected president of the State Board of Agriculture for the 1984-85 term.

Epler, 59, of rural Hallowell, was chosen at an organization meeting following the board's 113th annual meeting here. In addition, the board voted to reappoint Harland E. Priddle to a second two-year term as Kansas Secretary of Agriculture.

William V. Mai, of Sharon Springs, was selected vice president of the board and Leon D. Riffel, of Enterprise, was named treasurer. Also, four board members were re-elected to three year terms. They are: Jack Beauchamp of Ottawa; F.E. Bliss of Longton; Floyd Coen of Elkhart; and Duane Steeples of Zurich.

Pryor aids heart transplant fund

LOS ANGELES — Comedian Richard Pryor donated $10,000 to a fund set up for the family of a young man who was forced to undergo a heart transplant because of disease, Tony Tripi, a hospital spokesman, said Friday.

The donation raised the total of the Derrick Gordon Heart Fund at County-USC Medical Center to $310,000, Tripi said.

Gordon, 20, is recovering at Stanford University Medical Center. He suffered from an apparently hereditary disease — ideopathic dilated cardiomyopathy — which resulted in an enlarged and weakened heart.

The fund received donations from a number of celebrities other than Pryor, including Willie Nelson, Reggie Jackson, Norman and Frances Lear and Charles Bronson and Jill Ireland. However, county health officials said the bulk of the donations came from private citizens.

Painter to donate art collection

BARCELONA, Spain — Surrealist painter Salvador Dali says he will donate 621 of his works, valued at $20 million, to a new foundation named for him and his late wife.

The artist announced the creation of the foundation Wednesday in a statement released by his secretary, Miguel Domenech.

Dali has been in seclusion at his castle in Pubol on the Costa Brava, south of Barcelona, since the death in 1982 of his Russian-born wife, Gala. The 79-year-old artist has been in poor health, but doctors said Wednesday his condition was stable.

Art inspires Broadway musical

NEW YORK — Paintings have inspired songs — "Mona Lisa" — and an advertising campaign for Dutch Masters cigars. Now there's a Broadway musical — "Sunday in the Park with George."

Mandy Patinkin, who played Che Guevara in the original New York cast of "Evita," and Bernadette Peters, who appeared in the movies "Pennies from Heaven" and "The Jerk," will star in the new musical, suggested by George Seurat's "A Sunday Afternoon on the Island of La Grande Jatte."

The painting, which hangs in Chicago's Art Institute, is considered Seurat's masterpiece.

High school ends sooner for some Early college entrance may be liability

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

Many students consider their senior year in high school a time for increased study and emphasis on a future trade or profession, as well as a time for fun and enjoying the privileges that come with being at the top.

However, others are eager to graduate from high school and begin their formal university education early. For them, college can be a more frightening, confusing and exciting experience than for those students who attend college after four full years of high school.

David Koran, counselor at Manhattan High School, said only about 4 percent of the current senior class of 356 chose this alternative.

Koran said most students graduate early from high school for educational advancement and choose to attend K-State. However, others begin working full-time to save money for college, to begin learning a trade or to pursue a career in the military. He said the counselors at MHS do not encourage such a move.

"We see it (early graduation) as a disadvantage to students. They are a semester behind (at K-State) and have to start competing with students who have been in the University for a semester already. They are usually pretty isolated, and we feel they are much better prepared if they stay in (high) school and take a full load of courses their senior year," Koran said.

Betty Robison, counselor at Luckey High School, said the seniors at LHS aren't permitted to graduate early. However, students who have near the required 22 units of credit are allowed to attend classes during the morning and leave in the afternoon to go to work and university or vocational classes through the school's Senior Release program. Only 10 students from the current class of 27 seniors participate in the program. Of these students, three will be taking classes at K-State.

Steve Hall, assistant registrar, said the registrar's office doesn't keep specific statistics of early high school graduates who enroll at K-State. But there are approximately 20 students at K-State who are 17 years old and younger, he said.

Kent Mahanna, junior in pre-med, came to K-State in January of his senior year in high school. Mahanna attended high school in Hoxie, Kansas, and was a member of a senior class of 56 students. He said 11 students from his class graduated early, but only two went on to college.

"I was tired of doing the same stuff. I was bored and ready for something new," Mahanna said.

Mahanna said his parents were apprehensive at first, but later became supportive. The counselors at his high school also were helpful and supported him in his decision, he said.

Mahanna said he didn't notice any major disadvantages to entering the University early and doesn't regret his decision.

"Everything went real smoothly. They (K-State) had meetings and letters that explained everything — what you were supposed to do and where you were supposed to be," he said.

Although Mahanna knew "next to no one," he said he was lonely only for the first two days or so. Mahanna lived in Marlatt Hall during his first semester and said that was a major advantage because he met many people.

Karen Widman, freshman in pre-med, graduated from MHS after the first semester of her senior year. She said she graduated from high school early to "get a head start" on her education. She currently is taking 10 hours of classes at K-State and also works at Memorial Hospital.

Widman said she decided to graduate early because she had completed all classes pertaining to her major at MHS and felt "there was no point in taking pud classes."

Several teachers at the high school were extremely supportive of Widman and helped her set goals and obtain information, she said.

Despite the concerns of Koran and other counselors at MHS, Widman said she isn't at a disadvantage although she is younger than other freshmen at K-State.

"I don't look at it as being a semester behind, I look at it as being a semester ahead," she said.

Scientists prove risks of blood cholesterol

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Scientists said Thursday they finally have conclusive proof that lowering blood cholesterol can reduce the incidence of heart attack and coronary disease.

The results of a nationwide, 10-year federal study remove all doubts that people can reduce their heart disease risks through lower fat diets and, in some cases, drugs that strip cholesterol from the body.

The trial, which involved more than 3,800 men studied at 12 medical centers, showed that lowering cholesterol reduced the incidence of heart attacks by an average of 19 percent, said Dr. Basil M. Rifkind of the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute, which sponsored the study.

The results also show that reducing cholesterol reduces incidents of painful angina and the need for coronary bypass operations, Rifkind told a news briefing.

Although the trial primarily was designed to test the effects of using a cholesterol-lowering drug on middle-aged men with elevated levels of the blood fats, Rifkind said the results have implications for the entire population.

"This is the first study to demonstrate conclusively that the risk of coronary heart disease can be reduced by lowering blood cholesterol," he said.

"For each 1 percent fall in cholesterol, a 2 percent reduction in heart attack risk can be expected," he continued.

An estimated 30 million Americans have elevated blood levels of cholesterol and other fats, Rifkind said. If all of them lowered cholesterol to normal levels, perhaps 100,000 deaths could be eliminated each year, he added.

Cholesterol is a fatty substance naturally found in the body that at higher levels has been implicated in hardening of the arteries, which in turn leads to heart attack and stroke.

Innovation, musical strength shown in year's best albums

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

It is never easy to compile a list of the best albums of any given year. Thousands of LPs are released yearly by competent musicians, and often a fine line separates the truly extraordinary albums from the simply very good.

It is equally hard to be truly objective in preparing a list such as this. Such factors as release date, radio airplay, degree of commerciality, and performer history can add biases, not to mention personal taste.

Nonetheless, the new year wouldn't be the same without some retrospective view of the previous year's best releases.

1983 was a particularly hard year to judge. Some of the best LPs of the year, Michael Jackson's "Thriller" and Prince's "1999" for example, were actually released late in 1982, spoiling their eligibility.

Some of the albums on this list could be called "shakers" — the type of album that grabs the music industry by the ear and forces it to listen. These LPs are of such quality that although the listener may not enjoy the music or style, he must admit having reverence for the quality of the release.

Other LPs are simply truly enjoyable. They may never inspire new trends in the industry, nor shake a nonbeliever into submission, but are noteworthy all the same.

Due to the complications of attempting to compare totally unrelated musical styles and influences with each other, these LPs are arranged in alphabetical order by artist, not in order of preference.

Fools Face—"Public Places" — The release of this LP has provided many opportunities for a locally well-known band from Springfield, Mo. The album features smooth vocals and tight musicianship, forming a combination of some of the best ballads and full-blown rockers since the days of the Beatles.

Genesis—"Genesis" — Although definitely not a "shaker," Phil Collins, Tony Banks and Mike Rutherford have produced a solid LP, and one well deserving its commercial success. Co-produced by veteran Hugh Padgham (producer of the Police and XTC), "Genesis" is a bit too slick at times, but successful overall.

Billy Joel—"An Innocent Man" — This LP was a diversion from typical Joel material. It showcased two sides of his musical personality — both early rock and pure pop. Although the album was shunned by some as not being a serious work, it was highly enjoyable and a worthwhile investment.

The Police—"Synchronicity" — In spite of the fact that "Synchronicity" has had enough radio airplay to make the most dedicated Police fan regurgitate, it has to be admitted that the LP is fantastic. Recognized as one of the best songwriters in the past ten years, Sting lived up to his reputation on this album.

R.E.M.—"Mummer" — The first album (they released an EP earlier this year) by this band from Athens, Ga. is hopefully a sign of great things to come. "Mummer" has helped R.E.M. prove itself to be one of the most innovative, fresh-sounding young bands to emerge in the United States in several years.

The Stray Cats—"Rant 'n' Rave" — Also definitely not a "shaker," this LP was nevertheless a strong album. Although the lyrical content of "Rant 'n' Rave" appealed mostly to junior high school students, the music contained more energy than most of the year's releases combined.

The Talking Heads—"Speaking In Tongues" — David Byrne and cohorts produced their most commercially successful album without compromising quality. Hopefully the appeal of "Burnin' Down the House" will draw the masses to some of the band's earlier work.

U2—"War" — This band from Ireland also is finally receiving the recognition it deserves. "War" features moving lyrics as well as well-performed musical breaks. Being innovative, U2 should be closely watched in the next few years. This LP is truly a "shaker."

Violent Femmes—"Violent Femmes" — Although discovered by the Pretenders' Chrissie Hynde, the Violent Femmes have made little noticeable impact on the music industry. Part of this could be attributed to some of the LP's off-color content, which excludes it from widespread airplay. The Violent Femmes are one of the most daring young bands to have produced an LP in 1983, however.

XTC—"Mummer" — Admittedly, this LP should not be included on this list, for the simple reason that it was never released in the United States. Available as an import, "Mummer" is still something to be reckoned with. The lyrics and music on the album are brilliant, and easy to listen to as well.

Mozart opera opens film series

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's "The Magic Flute" will open a three-week film series Jan. 16 which celebrates opera and its history.

The Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Committee will sponsor the series.

The opera series will also feature film versions of Giuseppe Verdi's "La Traviata" and Gilbert and Sullivan's "The Pirates of Penzance."

"The Magic Flute," Ingmar Bergman's 1975 film adaptation of Mozart's opera, stars Ulrik Cold and Josef Kostlinger.

The opera was first performed in Vienna in 1791, shortly before Mozart's death. "The Magic Flute" is considered significant because it shows decided change in the composer's approach to opera, displaying a new seriousness and sincerity.

Verdi's "La Traviata," (The Erring One), is the second film in the opera series. This 1982 academy award nominee was directed and adapted by Franco Zeffereilli and stars renowned opera singers Placido Domingo and Teresa Stratas.

With its first performance in 1850, "La Traviata" was one of the first operas to incorporate a contemporary plot, a practice which wasn't to become commonplace in opera until 40 years later.

The final film in the series is based on a more contemporary piece composed by Gilbert and Sullivan which had a successful Broadway revival in the late 1970s. "The Pirates of Penzance" film adaptation was produced by Broadway producer Joseph Papp. The film stars Kevin Cline, Angela Lansbury, Linda Ronstadt and Rex Smith.

Top films of 1983 rise above video mania

Collegian Reviewer

The most important development in film in 1983 may very well prove to be the use of video by the popular music groups. "Flashdance" was little more than a series of videos strung together by the threads of a plot. The plot wasn't important at all, but what was important was the technically brilliant cinematography that captured the scenes of Jennifer Beals' sweat-soaked body as she pranced through some of the most sensual scenes ever put on film.

It didn't seem to bother most of the film's vast audience that the plot was completely hollow. The younger audience has come to expect film to entertain in the same way that a video game might entertain. The musical groups of today have made their videos non-stop barrages of surrealistic images that are meant to grab viewers' attention quickly, then shift to another scene for fear that the audience's attention span will deteriorate. Delivering information or content is no longer viewed as being important; the surface glitter is all that really matters.

Many of the films on the following 10 best list have yet to play in Manhattan. Any movie that began showing in Kansas City during 1983 has been considered eligible for the following list.

1. Sophie's Choice
Alan Pakula's film based on the William Styron novel is a passionate and devastating examination of love, lust, isolation and death. While the transference from page to film has caused the material to be streamlined, little of the novel's force was lost in the process. Much of the condensing has to do with the relationships between the film's three leading characters. Without the congruous contributions of cinematographer Nestor Almendros and art director John Moore, this might have become a liability. Instead they very carefully create an atmosphere which greatly complements the character's actions. Without the carnality of Styron's novel, (it is only hinted at in the film), there is a definite reduction in the depth of the characterizations, but Meryl Streep, Kevin Kline and Peter McNichol give such outstanding performances that this alteration is not as noticeable as it might have been.

2. Tender Mercies
The single best performance in any movie released in 1983 may belong to Robert Duvall for his performance as Mac Sledge — a washed-up country singer who finds new purpose in life when he meets and weds a young widow. As has happened in so many movies in the past few years, a truly original upon American life has required a director from outside the U.S., Australian Bruce Beresford. The plot avoids the major confrontations of life and focuses on the quiet moments. "Tender Mercies" is a celebration of those people with simple lifestyles.

3. Terms of Endearment
James Brooks' comedy/drama ventures very close to the cliched grab-your-hanky genre of films about the terminally ill. The characters are drawn with such precision that the film successfully avoids becoming simply a tear-jerker. Brooks chooses to give the viewer the intimate scenes in everyday life instead of opting for a more sensationalistic and attention-grabbing approach. He relies instead upon the formidable acting talents of the cast to make the characters come to life. Jack Nicholson is particularly superb as an ex-astronaut who woos the shrewd Shirley MacLaine.

4. Local Hero
The year's best comedy was "Local Hero." This story of an oil company executive venturing to Scotland to convince a small village to sell their land is full of affectionate humor and brilliant plot twists. Instead of falling into the typical Hollywood cliché of making the Scottish locale so magnificent that the villagers would never want to leave, director Bill Forsyth turns the tables. The villagers are very willing to sell, but fear they will reduce the price tag of their land by appearing overly zealous. It's the oil company executive who is won over by the charm of the locale, and then regrets having to close the deal. Meanwhile, the villagers have become so money-hungry that they begin pricing new homes and Rolls Royces.

5. The King Of Comedy
Rupert Pupkin dreams of the day when he will be a successful comedian who can sit down on a talk show and make small talk with the likes of Liza Minelli. His ultimate dream is to go on the Jerry Langford show (a takeoff on Johnny Carson's Tonight Show) and give his stand-up comedy routine. He desires success so much that he kidnaps Jerry Langford and, for ransom, asks to be allowed a 10-minute monologue on the show.

Director Martin Scorsese's satire on the extent that some people will go in their search for success is brazenly funny in its savage attack on the fickle nature of stardom. Robert DeNiro is excellent in the role of Rupert Pupkin, as is comedian Sandra Bernhard as his sidekick. Jerry Lewis is surprisingly effective as the talk show host. Lewis' performance is nothing like the mugging goon we have come to expect; for the first time in his career he underplays a character.

6. Never Cry Wolf
Charles Martin Smith is excellent as the biologist who ventures to northern Canada to study the timber wolves for a government report. Director Carol ("The Black Stallion") Ballard gives the film a mystical aura as he explores man's niche in nature. Never does the subject matter become sentimental or contrived as Ballard brilliantly films this story of a man adapting to nature.

7. Moonlighting
Jerzy Skolimowski's "Moonlighting" is a very sad comedy that focuses on a group of Polish carpenters who find themselves trapped in London when the political upheaval in their homeland closes off all traffic and communication routes. As the leader of the group, Jeremy Irons finds himself having to learn shoplifting techniques in order to provide for the men. The film is full of haunting images as the workers struggle to exist in a country in which they are completely out of place.

8. The Right Stuff
Although writer/director Philip Kaufman's idea of characterization too frequently turn into slapstick comedy, the moments that ring true in this story of the birth of the space age are numerous and very insightful. The film's best moments are with Sam Shepard as Chuck Yeager and Ed Harris as the Dudley Do-Right John Glenn.

9. Silkwood
Instead of opting for the high drama of "China Syndrome," director Mike Nichols chose to make "Silkwood" a low-key movie that examines the personal life of Karen Silkwood. The emphasis is less upon her discovering the hazardous conditions at the plutonium plant in which she worked than it is upon the twists that pulled her into becoming an activist. Meryl Streep turns in possibly the best performance of her career as Karen Silkwood, who becomes alienated from her co-workers.

10. The Big Chill
The year's greatest set of ensemble acting can be found in Lawrence Kasdan's "The Big Chill." The reunion of several ex-60's activists to mourn the death of a friend is used as a metaphor for the death of the part of themselves neglected when opting for typical middle-class lifestyles.

Farm Bureau rejects policy phasing out farm subsidies

By The Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. — The American Farm Bureau Federation Thursday rejected a proposal calling on the federal government to phase out tax-subsidized farm commodity programs after 1985.

But representatives of the 3.3 million-member group went on record favoring a market-oriented agriculture, meaning that "supply and demand, rather than government action, should ultimately determine production and price."

A 275-member group of voting delegates, meeting in the closing session of the Farm Bureau's 65th annual convention in Orlando, debated long and loud over proposed policy wording that read: "government subsidized farm commodity programs should be phased out after the 1985 crop year."

Instead, by a vote of 260-8, they substituted language which said the role of government in agriculture should "include the concept of target prices and loan levels."

The Farm Bureau has favored the traditional, conservative view of less government in all business, including agriculture.

The "National Farm Policy" proposed by its Resolutions Committee had reflected that. But a dissatisfied faction managed to change it, "providing something for everybody," one official said.

"It's a significant change in the sense that it allows the Southerners, and some others, to go home and live with Farm Bureau policy better than they've been able to in the past," said one knowledgeable industry leader who asked not to be identified.

"It does change our basic historic philosophy of less government," he added.

Many Farm Bureau leaders consider target prices and loan programs an incentive for overproduction, and they favor less "government interference" in farm affairs.

The new wording appeals primarily to tobacco, cotton and peanut interests in the South and wheat growers and feed grain producers in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa and the Midwest, according to convention sources.

In addition to calling for target prices and loan levels, the policy resolution includes a new clause which says the federal government should "recognize that all commodities are inter-related and any change in supply, demand or price of one affects the others."

It said that a long-term goal should be the establishment of all commodity price-support loan programs at "market-clearing levels."

It said that farmer-owned grain reserves should be ended and replaced by price-support, no-interest loans made available to wheat and feed grain producers for a nine-month period.

The Farm Bureau also restated its policy against trade embargoes on farm products "except where national security requires such action."

Some industry leaders blame the 1980 grain embargo to the Soviet Union as one of the root causes of a three-year drop in agricultural exports.

It said it favors non-subsidized trade on a commercial basis "unless such subsidies are necessary to regain markets taken by competing countries through the use of subsidies."

Another resolution adopted at the five-day convention, attended by some 7,000 members and their families, was in support of the Simpson-Mazzoli immigration bill pending in Congress. The legislation requires a search warrant before immigration officials can enter agricultural fields and reduces employer sanctions for hiring illegal farm labor.

The voting delegates also urged the U.S. Department of Agriculture to implement a disclosure law to determine the extent of foreign investment in American farmland and its effect on this country's agriculture.

USDA should consider possible legislation restricting or reducing foreign ownership, the farm group said.

It also restated its policy that Farmers Home Administration disaster loans should not be subsidized by the federal government and should go only to farmers who suffer "unusual natural disasters" and are unable to obtain loans elsewhere.

Sluggish Wildcats stuff scrappy EWU, 64-57

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Balanced scoring has become a common occurrence with K-State this season, and the Wildcats needed every point they could get to hold off the scrappy Eastern Washington University, 64-57, Thursday night at Ahearn Field House.

Four players, led by sophomore guard Jim Roder's 14 points, scored in double figures. Freshman center Alex Williams, sophomore forward Tyrone Jackson and junior guard Eric Watson also hit in double figures with 12, 10 and 11 points, respectively. Eastern Washington's 6-foot-9 center Tony Chrisman led all scorers with 21 points.

The night started tough for the visiting Eagles as they found themselves down 1-0 even before the opening tipoff. A double technical foul was called on the Eastern Washington bench for not reporting its lineup and roster on time, and junior Eddie Elder hit one of two free throws to give K-State the lead.

Baskets by Williams and Roder put the Wildcats ahead, 5-0, but Eastern Washington, led by Chrisman and a scrappy match-up zone defense, fought back.

Midway through the opening period, the two teams were tied at 13-all until Chrisman scored two of his 15 first-half points to give the Eagles their first lead of the night at 15-13. Both teams traded baskets the rest of the half until a three-point play by Williams with four seconds remaining gave the 'Cats a four-point halftime edge, 31-27.

K-State hit 40 percent from the field in the first half of play, while the Eagles connected on 56 percent.

Early in the second half, K-State took control as it assigned two, and sometimes three players to cover Chrisman. The 'Cats also began to warm up on the offensive end, finding holes in the Eagles' defense for easy inside shots.

With Chrisman bottled up inside, Eastern Washington was forced to utilize the outside shooting of guards Jeff Reinland and Melvin Bradley to stay within striking distance.

K-State outscored Eastern Washington 11-2 within a five-minute period to coast to a 48-37 lead with 8:49 remaining. Highlighting the surge was a three-point play by junior forward Lafayette Watkins and a driving hook shot by Jackson.

The Eagles refused to fold, however, and began a game-ending comeback try. A Chrisman hook shot with 3:50 left pulled Eastern Washington within five at 60-55, but that was as close as the Eagles could come.

K-State Coach Jack Hartman had nothing but praise for an Eastern Washington squad, whose record fell to 2-14 this season.

"They played well. I thought they played very well," Hartman said.

Hartman said he wasn't as pleased with the overall play of the 'Cats, especially with Big Eight Conference play nearing.

"I think we were trying too hard," he said. "We didn't play with much confidence and recognition on defense, and consequently I think we locked up a little bit."

"We've got to play a great deal better than we have in the last two games. We haven't played well since we took some time off."

Hartman said he was pleased by the performances of Jackson coming off the bench, as well as with Williams in his first starting role.

"Tyrone came in and did an excellent job," he said. "He got very involved and did a good job of reading the defenses, and he did a good job on the defensive end."

"Alex played well," Hartman added. "He hurried himself a little bit, but it was obvious that he would probably rush things with his first start, and the defense was the type that would have a little crowd around him when he got the ball. But he played strong."

K-State, which improved its record to 7-5 with the win, will face the University of Southern Colorado Saturday night and travels to Stillwater, Okla., Jan. 18 to open Big Eight play against the Oklahoma State Cowboys.

K-State forward Tom Alfaro and Eastern Washington University guard Jeff Reinland react to a loose ball after Reinland knocked it out of Alfaro's hands.

Reinland came up with the ball and two points on the play during the first half of Thursday's game. The Wildcats won the contest 64-57.

Hatfield named top coach

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — Ken Hatfield, who led the Air Force Academy to its first 10-victory season and then was hired away by Arkansas, his alma mater, was named major-college Kodak Coach of the Year on Thursday.

For the first time, the AFCA chose a Coach of the Year in four categories, rather than one each in the University and College Divisions.

Hatfield won in University Division I-AA, while Rey Dempsey, who led Southern Illinois to a national championship and then accepted the job at Memphis State, was named Coach of the Year in Division I-AA.

Don Morton of North Dakota State's NCAA Division II national champions won out in College Division I, which includes NCAA Division II and NAIA Division I schools, while Bob Reade of Augustana, Ill., winners of the Division III national playoff, was named in College Division II, which consists of NCAA Division III and NAIA Division II schools.

All four winners were honored Thursday night at the AFCA's annual Coach of the Year banquet.

Hatfield, 40, gave the lion's share of credit for Air Force's 10-2 record, including a 9-3 Independence Bowl victory over Mississippi, to his players, "especially 23 seniors who didn't have any major-college scholarship offers when they came to the Air Force Academy."

At Arkansas, Hatfield succeeds Lou Holtz, whose main failure in seven years was not getting the Razorbacks to the Cotton Bowl.

Although Hatfield's record in five years at Air Force was only 26-32-1, the Falcons were 18-7 over the last two years, including consecutive bowl victories over Vanderbilt in the Hall of Fame Bowl and Ole Miss, after eight straight losing seasons.

McAdoo lifts Lakers over Kings

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Bob McAdoo came off the bench to score 24 points and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar added 22 Thursday night to lift the Los Angeles Lakers to a 95-89 National Basketball Association victory over the Kansas City Kings.

The Lakers' victory overshadowed a brilliant performance by Kansas City reserve center LaSalle Thompson, who had career highs of 28 points.

The Kings broke open a close game early in the third quarter by outscoring the Lakers 15-4 to take a 70-60 advantage, their biggest of the game.

The Lakers, however, outscored Kansas City 12-2 in the final three minutes of the third quarter to forge a 72-72 tie.

A free throw by Thompson and a basket by Don Buse to start the fourth quarter gave Kansas City a 75-72 lead.

A basket by James Worthy midway through the fourth period gave Los Angeles the lead for good at 80-79. The Kings could get no closer than six points the rest of the way.

The Lakers, who also got 15 points each from Worthy and Earvin "Magic" Johnson, raised their record to 22-13.

Mike Woodson finished with 18 points and Eddie Johnson had 14 for the Kings, who snapped a two-game winning streak and fell to 15-20.

'Skins succeed on turnovers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Washington Redskins' secret weapon this year has been the turnover. But when they face the Los Angeles Raiders in the Super Bowl, they'll be meeting a team with a knack for rising above its own mistakes.

The NFC Champion Redskins have stolen the ball 68 times (30 fumbles, 38 interceptions) while compiling a league best 16-2 record through the playoffs. That, coupled with Washington's 21 turnovers, means the team has a turnover ratio of plus-47, an average of almost 3 per game.

By comparison, the Miami Dolphins in their undefeated (14-0) 1972 season, which they capped with a Super Bowl victory, had a turnover ratio of plus-18. The Pittsburgh Steelers, who have won four Super Bowls, were at their best in 1978 with a plus-9 takeaway ratio.

"A key to our success is our ability to hold onto the ball and force the other team into giving it up," said Redskins Coach Joe Gibbs.

The Raiders, 14-4, have turned the ball over 53 times this year, including seven in a game they lost to the Redskins 37-35.

Redskin quarterback Joe Theismann remembers the game well.

Two final Raider turnovers — a fumbled kickoff and an interception of a Jim Plunkett pass — allowed the Redskins to come from behind for the victory.

"Shows you how tough these guys are," Theismann said. "How can you give up seven drives and still score 35 points? I just hope we don't need seven turnovers to win again."

The Raiders, who pride themselves on their ability to hit hard and jar the ball loose from an opponent's grasp, have caused 38 fumbles this year, recovering 18.

The Raider defense will key on Redskin runningback John Riggins, the workhorse of the Washington offense and one of the surest ballhandlers in the league.

In his last six playoff games, all victories and all 100-yard plus rushing efforts, Riggins has carried the ball 197 times without a fumble.

"He has arms like a vise and cradles the ball with both hands," noted Redskin backfield coach Don Breau.

The defending Super Bowl champions, who beat San Francisco 24-21 last week for the NFC title and were rewarded by Gibbs with five days off, begin preparation for Super Bowl XVIII today.

The coaches have been formulating their game plan all week and will discuss it with players on Monday and Saturday. The team leaves Monday for Tampa, Fla., site of this year's Super Bowl on Jan. 22.

Tennis star Navratilova receives female athlete of the year title

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Martina Navratilova, overwhelmingly named as the 1983 Associated Press Female Athlete of the Year, said it was another title that she expected to win.

"My goal has been to be No. 1 and keep winning," the tennis star said after a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters voted her the year's top female athlete.

She easily outdistanced track star Mary Decker, the 1982 AP Female Athlete of the Year, by a vote of nearly 2-1. Navratilova collected 82 ballots, while Decker, a double gold medalist at the World Track and Field Championships in Helsinki, Finland, received 44.

Others receiving votes included downhill skier Tamara McKinney; distance runner Grete Waitz of Norway; volleyball star Rita Crockett; Cheryl Miller, a basketball star at the University of Southern California; and golfer JoAnne Carner.

"I'm glad that I got it," Navratilova said of the award which was announced Thursday, "but I thought I should have gotten it in 1979 (Tracy Austin was the recipient)" when she also was ranked No. 1 in the world.

In 1983, Navratilova was awesome, winning 86 matches while losing just one and capturing 15 of the 16 tournaments she entered. Her victories included three of the four Grand Slam tournaments — Wimbledon for the fourth time, the Australian Open for the second time and her first U.S. Open crown.

"My biggest thrill was winning the U.S. Open," she said, "because it had eluded me for so long. I put more sweat into winning the U.S. Open than any other tournament."

She has won her last 50 matches and is just six away from the modern women's record set by Chris Evert Lloyd in 1974.

"I'm honored with the award," said Navratilova, a native of Czechoslovakia, who became a U.S. citizen in 1981. "I'm really glad because it's people that vote on it."

PR executive initiates ploy against adoption agencies

By College Press Service

"If a college girl got pregnant and planned on giving the baby up for adoption, I think she'd be looking for someone like me," said Jonna Gould of Gould and Associates, a New York public relations firm.

Gould, no newcomer to the college market after she built her reputation by promoting the highly-successful "Preppy Handbook" several years ago, is working on what may be the most ambitious marketing plan of her career.

She can't get pregnant, but she said she's betting she can adopt a baby by sidestepping adoption agencies and advertising directly to college women who have unplanned pregnancies.

But student health center and adoption agency officials greet Gould's idea with mixed reactions and generally pessimistic predictions of its feasibility.

"I've been looking into adoption for me and my husband for over six months," Gould said. "You call up an adoption agency and they tell you it could be eight or nine years (before a child is placed with you)."

"It suddenly hit me that the college market might be just the place to match with a girl who was going to put her baby up for adoption anyway. I realized these are the people who are going to get you a baby."

But that reasoning is debatable, according to several college family planning experts.

"I'm noticing more students are keeping their children rather than having abortions," said Diane Brukardt, director of family planning services at the University of Missouri-Columbia.

"I don't remember very many who've decided to put the babies up for adoption," she said. "A much larger number of students are opting to keep their children and raise them as single parents."

At Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., "we don't usually have too many students who elect to continue an unplanned pregnancy," said Nancy Cote of the school's family planning clinic.

"Most students opt for abortion," she said, "but if the person wishes to carry the child through to term, we refer them to an adoption agency."

The college market may not be quite the wealth of potentially adoptable babies Gould believes it is, Cotes and Brukardt said.

In addition, "adoptive parents have to be prepared. We have a one-year education program all parents must go through before we approve placing a child with them," said JoAnn Slate, a counselor with the Methodist Mission Home in San Antonio, Texas, which has adoption and counseling centers nationwide.

Slate questioned Gould's eight- or nine-year waiting period for adopting a child and said if a couple is willing to take a disadvantaged or minority child, there is no problem in receiving a child. But, if for example, a green-eyed, Anglo baby is the only child a couple will accept, it could take several years.

Slate said she doubted the idea that the college market has an unusual number of babies available for adoption.

"We work with a number of college towns, and it seems that among the younger single students today it is very popular to keep children and raise them on their own."

"Either that," Slate said, "or being college students who are serious about their education and careers, many are prone to choose abortion."

Despite these comments, Gould said she is undeterred.

"You spend half your life trying to avoid pregnancy and the other half trying to get pregnant, and it really is agonizing. We have everything but a child, and I'm serious when I say we'll do almost anything to get one."

Towards that goal, Gould said she plans to place ads in a number of college newspapers and magazines.

Gould will work with an attorney when and if any potential baby donors appear and said her method is better than some of the black market services other people use to adopt children.

"Some private adoption services charge up to $25,000, and the black market goes even higher. At least this way we can do everything properly, and we'd be dealing on a one-on-one basis with the mother. We'd see she's well taken care of, and we'd be the best parents in the world."

Study finds high-speed rail routes could not meet passenger quota

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A congressional study concluded Thursday that a high speed passenger rail system, like the Japanese "bullet train," is unlikely to attract enough riders to make money in the United States and probably would need government subsidies.

The study by the Office of Technology Assessment examined the prospects for conventional high-speed trains — already operating in Japan, France and Great Britain — as well as futuristic "magnetic levitation" systems capable of speeds exceeding 250 miles per hour.

development of high-speed rail service, "the technologies themselves are the least uncertain; they can be made to work," the report said.

"By far the most uncertain factor is the issue of ridership," it said. "Realizing very large ridership projections now being made will require a major change in current U.S. transportation patterns."

The technology office concluded that "based on foreign experience and current U.S. market factors, it appears that any U.S. corridor with totally new high-speed rail service would have difficulty generating sufficient revenues to pay entirely for operating and capital costs."

High-speed rail projects currently are under consideration for routes including Los Angeles-San Diego, Montreal-New York, Chicago-Detroit, Tampa-Orlando-Miami, Philadelphia-Pittsburgh and Akron-Columbus-Cincinnati.

Jury decides wife solicited Fort Riley soldier's murder

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — The wife of a Fort Riley soldier whose body was discovered last winter along the Kansas River was found guilty Thursday of solicitation to commit murder and aiding and abetting first-degree murder in her husband's death.

A 12-member Geary County District Court jury deliberated four hours before issuing the verdict against Brenda Lemon, 21, for her role in the Feb. 26 strangling of Pvt. Joseph Lemon, 20, in his Junction City home.

The jury found that Mrs. Lemon twice last February sought the help of another man to kill her husband.

A 20-year-old Fort Riley soldier last week told Geary County District Judge Melvin Gradert that he strangled Lemon, then with the help of a Junction City man dumped the body into Lyons Creek south of the city.

The soldier, Pvt. Kevin Peters, has pleaded guilty to second-degree murder.

Jerry Crenshaw, 21, of Junction City, was sentenced last fall to up to 14 years in prison on charges of conspiracy to commit murder and aiding a felon in Lemon's death.

The solicitation charge against Mrs. Lemon carries a maximum sentence of five to 10 years in prison, while the charge of aiding and abetting first-degree murder carries a life sentence.

A Feb. 21 sentencing date was set for Mrs. Lemon, who remained held on $50,000 bond in the Junction City Municipal Jail.

Reagan's speech draws cynical Soviet reply

President attempts to calm fears

Russians view remarks as ploy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, trying to calm fears about the risk of war between the United States and Soviet Union, says his big buildup in military spending "is making the world a safer place" and putting America in a strong position to forge a "realistic" relationship with the Kremlin.

In a speech two weeks before his expected re-election announcement, Reagan says, "I believe 1984 finds the United States in its strongest position in years to establish a constructive and realistic working relationship with the Soviet Union."

The president will make the remarks in a nationally broadcast address at 10 a.m. EST today from the East Room of the White House. Excerpts of the address were released in advance.

White House advisers who insisted on anonymity said a chief purpose of the speech was to try to dispel any image of Reagan in this election year of being a "warmonger."

In the past, Reagan has labeled the Kremlin "an evil empire" whose leaders resort to lying and cheating. He is expected to soften his tone in today's speech and appear more conciliatory.

In his prepared remarks, Reagan alluded to three years of large increases in Pentagon spending, including funds for production of the 10-warhead MX nuclear missile and the B-1 bomber.

"America's deterrence is more credible and it is making the world a safer place; safer because now there is less danger that the Soviet leadership will underestimate our strength or question our resolve," the president said.

"Neither we nor the Soviet Union can wish away the differences between our two societies and our philosophies," said Reagan.

"But we should always remember that we do have common interests and the foremost among them is to avoid war and reduce the level of arms. There is no rational alternative but to steer a course which I would call credible deterrence and peaceful competition; and if we do so, we might find areas in which we could engage in constructive cooperation," he said.

Reagan's speech comes against the backdrop of a suspension in U.S.-Soviet negotiations for curbing long-range and medium-range nuclear weapons and reducing conventional forces in Europe. The president was expected to urge Moscow to return to the bargaining table.

The speech's timing is complicated by the fact that the administration is ready to send Congress a report charging that the Soviets have violated at least three arms agreements and probably have broken others.

The administration is concerned that the report, following Reagan's conciliatory speech, will send out a confusing signal.

The address is aimed at three audiences: the Kremlin; an American electorate nervous about the icy state of U.S.-Soviet relations; and Europeans concerned about the breakdown of arms talks and deployment of new U.S. nuclear missiles on NATO soil.

A White House official who insisted on anonymity said the speech is also designed to help set the stage for Secretary of State George P. Shultz' meeting Wednesday with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko.

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Soviet Union signaled Sunday that it was likely to spurn any olive branch offered by President Reagan or by Western nations resuming dialogue with the East in Stockholm this week.

The official newspaper Sotsialisticheskaya Industriya (Soviet Industry) said superpower relations had hit the "lowest point" possible and gave little hope they would improve soon.

It said Reagan's speech on U.S.-Soviet relations, to be given today, would be just a campaign ploy to convince American voters that he is not "fanning up tensions."

As for the Stockholm conference and a planned meeting there Wednesday between Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko, it said these "in no way can replace" the Geneva talks on strategic arms and nuclear missiles in Europe.

The Stockholm talks are set to open Tuesday and will focus first on confidence-building measures to increase European security.

The Soviets broke off the Euromissile talks in Geneva Nov. 23 after West Germany reaffirmed its commitment to deploy Pershing IIs and cruise missiles as part of NATO's response to the Soviet buildup of SS-20s.

The Kremlin later refused to set a date for the next round of the parallel superpower talks on limiting strategic nuclear arms.

Gromyko said 10 days ago that his meetings with Shultz and with West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher could not substitute for the Geneva negotiations.

Shultz arrived in London Sunday — complaining of a "nagging cold" — for talks with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and other government leaders before going on to Stockholm today.

The latest Soviet warnings are in tune with repeated Soviet news media comments stressing the increased danger of nuclear war in Europe now that NATO has gone ahead with deployment of the first of 108 Pershing IIs and 464 cruise missiles it plans to install by 1988.

Although it failed to block the initial deployments, the Kremlin apparently still feels its most effective course is to continue to pressure West Europeans into breaking ranks with Washington, either by instilling fear or by pointing to the unpredictability of West Europe's American ally.

Sotsialisticheskaya Industriya made clear that in Moscow's view, the responsibility and the best chances for easing East-West tension lie with the West Europeans.

"The chances of the Stockholm meeting will depend in the first place on whether the NATO countries and above all the states of Western Europe are ready to withdraw from the policy of confrontation with the countries of the socialist camp, which is forced upon them by the U.S.A.," it said.

West European nations should "refrain from attempts to break the existing relationship of forces" and instead "meet the legitimate interests of socialist states in the field of security."

The commentary followed a puzzling Tass report Saturday in which the Soviets accused the United States of deliberately supporting an Estonian nationalist group in order to wreck chances of agreement in Stockholm.

Acker prioritizes plans for progress

By KAREN BELLUS
Staff Writer

President Duane Acker outlined goals for 1984 Wednesday, including developments in the colleges of Education and Veterinary Medicine, increasing funding for Farrell Library and recognizing outstanding academic advising.

Acker said there would be "five major thrusts" in the College of Education for the years 1984 through 2000. These thrusts would "identify activities and tasks we should concentrate on to maintain or achieve national or regional recognition."

Acker said he hopes to provide the new dean of the College of Education with a set of targets or a framework for the college. He said this goal reflects recent, nationwide attention to education, and there may be increased funding as a result of action.

Attention will also be given to the identification of five priorities for additional development of the Veterinary Medicine Complex for the years 1984-2000.

"Again, we have the same situation (as the College of Education). The dean will retire, and we feel it is appropriate to establish what our targets are, such as funding and specialization," Acker said.

Acker identified increased funding for Farrell Library as a goal for 1984. A minimum of $200,000 beyond any inflationary factor will be allocated to the library for 1984. He said this money would be used mainly to benefit the students in such ways as increased journal subscriptions, and not necessarily to help the library obtain membership in the Association of Research Libraries. Farrell is the only Big Eight university library that isn't an ARL member.

Recognizing excellence in academic advising also has been targeted for 1984. Acker said student and faculty feedback will contribute to the recognition and acknowledgment of academic advisers on a University-wide scale.

"We will try to recognize those advising units doing an outstanding job of academic advising and help others move forward. Our emphasis will start on positive units so we can learn who we want to copy," he said.

Two other goals Acker outlined for 1984 are development of a computerized system for automatic personnel salary transfer and establishment of an information and education program for retirement planning for classified and unclassified employees.

Acker said he believes K-State had a good deal of success in achieving its goals during 1983, but it was difficult to measure that success in relation to previous years because goals were not formally set then.

"One of our efforts is to move toward goal-oriented leadership in the total University. We can do a better job of helping each other and, if the goal is written down, it provides an opportunity for satisfaction," he said.

Kennedy to kick off '84 Landon Lectures

Three prominent officials will be included on the roster for the Landon Lecture Series this semester, William Richter, series chairman and professor of political science, said.

Senator Edward "Ted" Kennedy (D-Mass.) has been scheduled as the first of the three speakers, Richter said. Kennedy, considered a political force in the Democratic Party, was a presidential contender in the 1980 election. Although a recent illness prompted Kennedy to cancel most of his speaking engagements, Richter said Kennedy has not cancelled his plans to speak at K-State Jan. 30.

Hodding Carter III was a spokesman for the State Department during Jimmy Carter's administration. Since that time, Carter has worked for the Public Broadcasting System and will have a weekly program premiering this month, Richter said.

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley has finally been scheduled to speak after a couple of years of effort, Richter said.

Citizens celebrate King day

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

"The greatest harm of discrimination is practiced in highly integrated situations," said Topeka psychiatrist Dr. Gilbert Parks at the Martin Luther King Jr. birthday celebration Sunday night at the Douglass Center Annex, 901 Yuma St.

Parks, keynote speaker for the commemoration of King's 55th birthday, addressed the issues of integration, discrimination and segregation in America today. Saying that integration is often the first step in discrimination, Parks used the presidential campaign of the Rev. Jesse Jackson as an example of the blacks' plight.

The birthday celebration became more of a political platform as Parks characterized Jackson as a "disciple" of King's. Jackson, back from his rescue mission of Lt. Robert Goodman in Syria, is being lauded by his followers for making contact with other nations during his presidential campaign. Immediately upon Jackson's return, President Reagan appointed an ambassador to the Vatican, directly negating the American pursuit of separation of church and state and lessening the coverage of Jackson's rescue mission, Parks said.

The program contained lighter activities than those Parks addressed. An invocation, formal greeting, songs, poetry and a benediction, including Parks' oratory, combined to commemorate King, the civil rights leader who was shot to death outside his Memphis motel room in 1968.

Born in Atlanta, King became the voice of a segment of the black population who believed they were oppressed. James Spencer, coordinator of the Manhattan Steering Committee of Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Program, drew an analogy between King and Christ in the program's introduction.

"King went on the battlefield and died for us, leaving behind love, peace, harmony, his dream and this world," Spencer said.

Democratic presidential hopefuls sound off in TV debate

By The Associated Press

HANOVER, N.H. — The Democratic presidential candidates were generally pleased Sunday with their performances in a three-hour nationally televised debate that became heated at times.

"I thought most of it was good and sharp and important," former Vice President Walter F. Mondale said. "There were certainly no holds barred."

Mondale, perhaps because of his status as the front-runner, was attacked by several of the other candidates, particularly Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, who is No. 2 in polls.

At one point, Glenn called Mondale's economic proposals "gobbledygook." Mondale responded by saying Glenn was using "voodoo numbers" for his own proposals. Mondale also criticized Glenn for voting for some of President Reagan's economic plans.

Glenn described the exchange as "just a little disagreement on where we are going." Mondale said he thought the debate went "very well." Asked about his encounter with Glenn, he replied: "I think the audience understood what I was saying. ... My record is very specific."

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, the only candidate who has not held elective office, was asked whether the Mondale-Glenn exchange and other contentious moments during the debate had hurt the Democratic Party.

"I don't know if it hurt the party, but it did not help to instruct the people," Jackson said.

George McGovern, the Democratic candidate who lost the 1972 presidential election to Richard Nixon, said that while he enjoyed the debate, he did not like the two leaders in the polls "cutting each other up."

"One of those two guys might be the nominee, and I don't want to see them too cut-up," McGovern said. "I don't think Mondale is making wild promises."

McGovern, a former senator from South Dakota, said he thought the debate was valuable.

"It is probably the most thorough airing of positions of the candidates we have had yet," he said. "All in all, it makes good political fare for the people of this country. Since we didn't have a football game today, it was pretty good substitute."

Discussing the overall debate, Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., said, "The whole exchange was good."

Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., said he thought the debate had helped his longshot candidacy because "people now know who I am."

"I think I fared very well because I contrasted both Sen. Glenn and Vice President Mondale, and that's what this race is all about," Hart said. "A debate of this sort shows the contrast between policies of the future and policies of the past."

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., said he was happy because arms control, "the theme I have stressed most, was the dominant theme of the debate. That is one aspect of success."

Cranston said he liked the debate's format because "it was pretty free wheeling."

Photographer to discuss Grenada

One of the first journalists allowed into Grenada after the invasion by American troops was Peter Leabo, a staff photographer for the Kansas City Bureau of the Associated Press.

Leabo will tell of his experiences at a special K-State journalism program at 7 p.m. Jan. 17 in the Union Little Theater. The public is invited.

Leabo's talk will be illustrated with slides made from pictures he and others on the AP coverage team obtained while in Grenada. There will be a question and answer period following his presentation.

Collegian awarded highest rating

The Kansas State Collegian has been rated a "five star All American" college newspaper for the second consecutive semester. The award is for the spring semester of the 1982-83 school year.

The five star rating is the highest recognition given by the Associated Collegiate Press, which is the largest collegiate rating service. Dave Adams, director of Student Publications at K-State, said the Collegian scored 3,905 of a possible 4,000 points.

To earn the rating, the Collegian had to receive "marks of distinction" in five categories: coverage and content; writing and editing; design; opinion content and photography, art and graphics.

Editor of the Collegian for the spring semester was Doug Ward, a May 1983 graduate from Fairbury, Neb. Ward is now news editor of the Parsons Sun.

Gift to aid basic cancer research

Jennie Marie Haymaker of Edina, Minn., has contributed $1,000 to the Center for Basic Cancer Research in the K-State Division of Biology.

The gift was given in memory of her husband, John Haymaker, a K-State alumnus and former vice president of the Cargill, Inc., Vegetable Oil Division. The funds will support two 1984 cancer research fellowships that will be given to undergraduate students at K-State by the University cancer center.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, said student applications for cancer research awards currently are being reviewed by a committee of scientists.

Initiated in 1981 with three cancer research scholarships, the program has spread across the entire campus and 30 fellowships will have been awarded this year. Students and faculty scientists work together to develop the formal applications, and the awards are given on a competitive basis.

Watercolors, prints to be shown

An exhibit of watercolors and prints by Keith Achepohl will be on display in the K-State Union Art Gallery, from Jan. 23 through Feb. 3. The gallery is open Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Achepohl, a professor of art at the University of Iowa, received his master's of fine arts degree from the University of Iowa in 1960. He has exhibited in many one-man and group exhibitions in the United States and internationally.

His work can be found in many museums (including the National Museum of American Art), and in university and private collections throughout the United States and in Spain, Japan and Egypt.

Lindsay Smith, gallery coordinator for the Union Program Council's Arts Committee, said Achepohl will lecture on Thursday, Feb. 2 at 7:30 p.m. in the K-State Union Little Theater. A reception will follow in the gallery. The public is invited.

Telenet offers chance to earn college credit

K-State offers ambitious high school students a new method of earning college credit — telenet courses through the Regents Network.

Telenet courses are arranged by telephone. The telephone is connected with a monitor, so a two-way communication system is established. High school students across Kansas may now benefit from these courses at any of 35 locations — usually a community building or center — where the monitors are available.

Beginning Feb. 9, the K-State Spring Honors Program will feature "The 1984 Election: Choices and Challenges" by Telenet. Eleven two-hour sessions during a 10-week period will focus upon pre-election issues and democratic topics.

Students wishing to enroll for two undergraduate hours of credit must pay a $58 fee at the first session. To gain credit, the student must attend all sessions and take a final exam.

Those not wishing to obtain credit may participate in the Mini-Series Honors Program. Five sessions are designated for the mini-series. Students interested in attending may do so at no cost.

Barbara Ender, off-campus programs coordinator, said the honors program has been, "overall, successful. The students like the college credit, which is transferable anywhere. It (the honors program) definitely speaks well for K-State as a university."

Through the offering of these courses, the Division of Continuing Education hopes to encourage high school students to participate in educational programs, she said. It also provides an opportunity for high school students to experience the atmosphere of K-State and to explore the facilities and programs available.

Correction

An article in Friday's Collegian stated that K-State graduates are paying more for their classes than undergraduates during the current school year. The differentiation in the assessment by the Board of Regents was actually for the 1984-85 academic year.

The story should have stated that returning students taking a class for fun will pay undergraduate fees unless they enroll in a graduate program.

Sledder injured

Patricia Villasi, junior in humanities, is helped by Riley County Ambulance and Riley County Police Department officers as other sledgers look on. Villasi was sledding at Cico Park when she slid into a ravine at the bottom of the hill and hit some rocks Sunday afternoon. The attendants put a splint on Villasi's left leg before transporting her by ambulance to St. Mary Hospital for treatment of a possible broken leg.

Coliseum fund-raisers near $7 million goal

Almost $4.75 million of the $7 million goal set for April has been raised from the University's alumni and friends for the new coliseum.

"We are very pleased with the results achieved thus far," Arthur Loub, KSU Foundation executive vice president, said.

The $7 million from alumni and friends is one of the three main blocks of funding that will finance the new $16 million facility. Student bonds and ticket surcharges will also contribute $7 million, and approximately $2 million will come from athletic sources.

The final third phase of the coliseum fund-raising campaign is about to be initiated. This phase consists of five regional campaigns that will cover every area of the state.

The first phase involved solicitation of the KSU Foundation Board of Trustees and the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' Ahearn Directors. The second stage, which is now being concluded, concentrated on solicitation of faculty and staff of the University and Manhattan citizens.

Loub said peer influence will be a key factor in the final phase of the campaign.

"In any campaign, peers give for several reasons, but they have to have a concern and interest for the event," he said.

With this attitude, the third phase sets up a structure in which donors will ask others of similar income for campaign contributions.

Loub said he is very optimistic about reaching the $7 million goal by April.

"We have had outstanding responses," he said, crediting the success of the funding drive to the volunteer structure which is the "backbone of the campaign."

Construction of the coliseum is scheduled to begin in 1988, with the completion date set for the end of the decade.

Center hails new building

Pawnee Mental Health Services celebrated its grand opening with a dedication ceremony Sunday afternoon in its new building.

Guests, which included Manhattan Mayor Wanda Fateley and several Manhattan residents, were present to view the facility at 2001 Claflin Rd.

Mental health services first became available in Riley County more than 20 years ago, but were spread out in three separate buildings. The completion of the new building marks the culmination of a long-term project to combine the buildings into one facility, said Diane Gaede, director of public information.

Funding for the center came from federal, state and local government sources, in addition to client fees. Other contributors to its completion were the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and the Riley County Commission, Gaede said.

The facility serves 10 surrounding counties through the 13 available programs including adult and child therapy, alcohol and drug counseling, workshops and partial hospitalization, she added.

LAFENE STUDENT HEALTH CENTER

1. Decisions about the requirement of health fees are made by Admission and Records. (See General Catalog under Fees).
2. All students who are enrolled and attending classes during a regular semester or summer session who have paid health fees are eligible for care.
3. Those enrolled in Special Courses, for varying periods of time, who have made previous arrangements for health care coverage at Lafene are eligible for care. (Lists of these students should be furnished ahead of time when possible.)
4. Only students, who have paid the health fee, may elect to have their spouse also covered at Lafene; however, they must pay the spouse fee within 10 days of the time their own health fees are paid. (Children cannot be seen).
5. Emergency care, prior to referral, will be given anyone who comes in.
6. Students enrolled in 6 hours or less, electing not to pay the health fee during the Fall or Spring semesters, who wish to be seen, will be charged $20 for each office visit. This charge continues until the full health fee has been exceeded, then that student will be afforded the same privileges as the regular fee paying student for the remainder of that semester.
7. Students who were enrolled in the Spring and pre-enrolled for the Fall semester but not attending summer school may pay $15 and be eligible for care during the summer. This fee may be paid within 30 days prior to summer registration and ends the day classes begin. A late fee of $20 will be accepted for the remainder of the summer.
8. Health fees are good until 12 o'clock the night the next semester begins.

NOTE: In addition to the above mentioned fees, there are minimal charges for certain supplies and services and the charges are subject to change without prior notice.

Library hours not its fault

In July 1982, daily hours at Farrell Library were cut considerably. Seven hours of weekly operation were eliminated, preventing students from studying at the library past 10:30 p.m. Since then, there has been criticism from both students and faculty that the University does not offer sufficient nighttime study facilities.

The criticisms are valid because a large and important facility for study and research is not available when both materials and study space are needed.

However, the criticisms have been misdirected at the library. What needs to be realized is that Farrell Library simply does not have the funds to stay open to fully accommodate the needs of the students and faculty at K-State. Criticism could be more effectively directed at University administration.

In 1984, $76,000 was cut from the library's operating budget. This money is used for wages, equipment and supplies. As a result, funds are not available to pay the personnel and student assistants needed to run the library during any additional hours of operation.

At the same time, the library also is trying to become a member of the Association of Research Libraries. Every other university in the Big Eight is a member of the ARL, and to be a member is tangible proof of a library's adequacy in accommodating the research and study activities of its students and faculty.

Brice Hobrock, dean of University libraries, said "ARL membership sets the standard by which to judge (the library's) adequacy." Not holding membership, he said, indicates the library cannot adequately support academic and research activities.

Hobrock estimated $400,000 would be needed to increase the library's materials just to equal the resources of the weakest member of ARL. For 1984, $200,000 has been allocated to the library. The ARL requires that a library successfully complete a four-year trial period before membership is assured. Although the additional funds could possibly be sufficient to improve the library enough to qualify for ARL trial membership for one year, it is obviously not enough to maintain that status for four years. Once an ARL member, a library may be dismissed if membership requirements are not maintained.

If the library is expected to achieve and maintain a level of excellence in meeting the needs and requirements of its patrons, the administration and students of K-State should emphasize the library's importance to the University and give it top priority.

In the future, more funds should be directed toward the library to help it become a member of ARL. In doing so, we would be improving the resources of our library and helping it to become an excellent facility for research and study such as K-State deserves.

Craft's victory only individual

Because of the second outcome of the now widely known Christine Craft trial, discrimination against a woman television anchor has been successfully exposed and punished.

In August Craft sued her former employer, Metromedia Inc., owners of KMBC-TV, Kansas City, Mo., claiming sex discrimination, violation of the Equal Pay Act and fraud, after she was demoted from anchor to reporter. A federal jury awarded her $375,000 in compensatory damages and $125,000 in punitive damages, but in October, U.S. District Judge Joseph E. Stevens Jr. set aside the jury award, claiming it to be "excessive." He decided her demotion did not result from sexual discrimination and ordered a new trial in Joplin, Mo.

In both trials Craft spoke of being required to have a cosmetic makeover and to follow a specific wardrobe plan, after her employers had assured her when they hired Craft that they were satisfied with her appearance. She also was paid less than her male co-anchor for comparable work. She left the station instead of accepting the lower, reporting position.

Because of Stevens' ruling, only the fraud charge was re-examined in the new trial. However, the jury of 12 men and women in Joplin still decided in favor of Craft, citing that the KMBC management had lied to her about the conditions of the anchor job when she was hired.

The jury offered a reduced award of $225,000 in compensatory damages for her "pain and suffering, mental anguish, medical costs, lost wages, emotional distress and career disruption." She also was awarded $100,000 in punitive damages against Metromedia.

The issue at trial was never that Craft should have accepted the management's appearance coaching as "part of the job." It was obvious to Craft, because her male co-anchor was not similarly instructed and was paid more for the same work, that the station valued first her on-air look and not her journalistic skills.

Craft's suit attracted national attention as the first of its kind to reveal the disparities between treatment of men and women television anchors. It points out that men are regarded first for their knowledge and ability, but that a woman's appearance determines her success no matter how qualified and capable she may be.

Fortunately for women, Craft's suit publicly protested this age-old discrimination. But it remains to be seen whether her victory will have any effect on television news.

Although Craft's case was unusual in that an employee proved the intentional fraud of an employer, the fact that her case was successful for only one person limits its immediate importance. She may have set a court precedent for ruling on similar cases, but the decision will hardly ensure that women television anchors will no longer meet sexual discrimination or will be paid the same as similar male anchors.

More must be done. Christine Craft's grit and determination to prove her case is admirable and commendable, for she has charted a course for others to follow. But Craft has only broken one chain-link in the fence that keeps women from equal status in the workplace. Other women must follow her example and act for themselves to combat sexual discrimination.

And unless the federal government works to enforce the Equal Pay Act in such instances of discrimination, little progress can effectively be made in changing attitudes about women's value and validity as members of the work force.

I'M GETTING WORRIED ABOUT THESE SMALL, INDEPENDENT PHONE SYSTEMS...

Jackson may have hurt chances

The Rev. Jesse Jackson has made himself a viable Democratic presidential candidate.

He is able to captivate audiences with his fiery oratory. He attacks President Reagan's policies with zeal. He blends old-time religious fervor with political savvy and adds a little charm to boot. The results are standing ovations and higher ratings in popularity polls.

I don't think Jackson will be elected president in November. I think his trip to Damascus will cost him the trip down Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House.

Yes, he did bring Navy Lt. Robert Goodman Jr. home. His "pilgrimage to Damascus" was hailed as a victory by many people. Jackson gained valuable media coverage, which pushed many presidential candidates — notably Walter Mondale — out of the limelight during the holiday season.

Jackson had everything to gain by trying to win Goodman's release from Syrian President Hafez Assad. Goodman, an aviator whose A-6 was shot down Dec. 4 while on a mission over Lebanon, was taken prisoner. His pilot, Lt. Mark Lange, was killed when the plane was shot down. Assad had vowed to keep Goodman as a "prisoner of war" until the Marines left Lebanon.

Jackson claimed the Reagan administration wasn't trying to secure Goodman's release from Assad. He said Reagan refused to discuss the situation with him. He then announced the plans for his trip and asked Reagan not to interfere.

Jackson, upon his arrival in Damascus, met with Goodman, who was being held in a military complex. Goodman told reporters he was in good health and dodged a lot of questions about his captors. He showed a T-shirt which had a fighter on it and the words ATKRON 85 above it. Goodman said his squadron would understand the message.

Jackson left Goodman to meet with Assad, with whom he pleaded for Goodman's release. On Jan. 4 Assad broke his earlier vow and let Goodman accompany Jackson back to the United States.

Jackson and Goodman were given a heroes' welcome in Washington.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Reagan hailed Jackson, Jackson thanked Reagan for not stopping his trip and Goodman thanked everyone for everything.

What a happy ending. What could be a problem with what Jackson did?

Plenty. Jackson's trip could have placed him in grave danger. While the chances of Jackson being taken prisoner or killed were slim, these possibilities existed. The United States could have been plunged into a needless war with Syria if something would have happened to Jackson during his "pilgrimage."

Another thing about Jackson's trip which bothered me was the way it was undertaken. I thought Jackson was trying to rebuke Reagan because Jackson thought Reagan wasn't trying hard enough to win Goodman's release.

I can remember the trips a lot of "well-meaning" folks, including former Secretary of State Ramsey Clark, a professor from the University of Kansas and the mother of a hostage, made to Iran in 1980, during the hostage incident. These people were upset with President Carter's handling of the situation and thought they could win the hostages' release. They had "meetings" and Christmas "celebrations" with the hostages. These events, it was discovered months later, were actually staged for the media. The hostages were cleaned up, paraded before the cameras and visitors, and then led back to their "prison." The visitors were then put back on the planes empty-handed.

The third thing which bothered me about Jackson's trip was the underlying feeling that Jackson, who is black, made the trip just because Goodman is black. I wonder if Jackson would have gone to Damascus to win the release of a white pilot — or an Asian pilot, or a Hispanic pilot. I also wonder if under the same circumstances and as president, Jackson would allow a white politician the opportunity to make a similar trip to win the release of a white pilot.

I can see why Assad released Goodman to Jackson. He probably thought he could undermine Reagan's credibility and authority by releasing Goodman to Jackson. Reagan would be left on the outside, looking in, while Jackson would receive the credit for Goodman's release.

The Ayatollah Khomeini tried a similar ploy in 1981 when he released the hostages on Jan. 20 — the day Reagan was sworn in as president. Carter's efforts to gain the release of the hostages were somewhat dimmed by rumors that Khomeini released the hostages on that day because he was scared Reagan would use force to get the hostages out of Iran. It was implied in these rumors that Reagan was a hero and Carter was nothing more than a bit player in the situation.

I think the American public realizes that Reagan had been trying to secure Goodman's release. I also believe that Reagan knew he had a lot to lose if he tried to stop Jackson's trip. In keeping silent, Reagan allowed Assad the opportunity to release Goodman in what Assad could claim as a "humanitarian gesture" and yet save Assad's own position in Syria.

The important thing is that Goodman is free. However, actions such as Jackson's should be scrutinized. Yes, he was successful this time. But the effect of Jackson's trip may bring unwanted results. It is possible that his actions could lead other nations, under similar circumstances, to refuse to negotiate with the government and wait for "Joe Politician" to come with the reporters and television crews before negotiating.

I don't think Jackson would approve of that. Neither should anyone else.

Assertion of rights not justification to kill

Editor,
Re: Kecia Stolfus' column, "A pro-choice response: uncovering contradictory right-to-life attitudes," in the Dec. 13 Collegian:
"I am against abortion because it is murder."

"Oh, I believe abortion is murder, but I can't have a child right now. If I were to get pregnant now I would have an abortion."

The preceding came from a conversation with the only pro-abortion person I ever met who answered the pro-life stance that abortion is murder. Why do you think the movement is called "pro-life," or "right-to-life?" Because that is the issue.

Most pro-abortion people will immediately side-step the main issue and start drawing attention to issues that are tough to deal with, yes, but don't change the fact of killing an unborn child. Pro-abortion people will tell you an unwanted pregnancy puts a burden on the mother. Stolfus says bearing children causes women to "forsake their own health and happiness...ignoring individual rights and interests."

Pro-life people aren't blind. I realize an unwanted child is a burden. I'm sure I was a burden for nine months. But is the assertion of one's "personal rights and interests" sufficient reason to kill another human? If you believe the arguments "a woman should have reproductive freedom," "abortion is a tool of a male-dominated society," or "a woman has more rights than an unborn child," then realize you are saying that this is sufficient justification to kill.

Obviously, I am talking about moral absolutes, which can be tough to follow. But no one said doing the right thing was going to be easy.

Lost keys lock Boyd Hall assistant out of job

By MARY COX
Contributing Writer

Shelly McNaughton, senior in radio-television, claims she was unjustly dismissed as resident assistant of Boyd Hall's third floor Dec. 16, 1983 for losing the keys entrusted to her.

"It was December 10, a Saturday afternoon, around 4 p.m.," McNaughton said. "I came up from the staff office. I had my keys with me. I went in (my room) and locked my door. I had a hook near my phone where I put my keys so I'd know where they were. I was in and out between 4 p.m. and 5:30 p.m. with the door shut but unlocked. I remember looking at 5 p.m. and they were still there. A friend called at 5:30 p.m. to ask me to go out for pizza. I was ready, so I went down to a girl's room between 5:30 p.m. and 5:45 p.m. When I went back to get my keys, they were gone."

The missing keys include a master key for the third floor, keys to the outside doors, the staff office, McNaughton's room and the key to the cabinet where all the keys for the residence hall are kept.

McNaughton told Lisa Mays, graduate student in guidance education and director of Boyd, about the missing keys the night they were discovered missing. McNaughton said Mays told her if she (McNaughton) did not find the keys, she might have to pay for replacing the locks.

Tuesday, Dec. 13, McNaughton and Mays talked to Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing. Proite told McNaughton she (McNaughton) would be fired if she did not find the keys.

Friday, Dec. 16, McNaughton received a letter of termination. Proite wrote, "To recap the situation, your keys were lost, stolen, or misplaced on Saturday, Dec. 10, 1983. In the fall of this year your hall director, Lisa Mays, covered the topic of keys during your staff workshop. The topic is also covered in your staff manual (Section III 9A). The safeguarding of master keys is an important performance expectation and the loss of such a master has serious implications. It was apparent during my conversation with you on Tuesday, Dec. 13, 1983 that you had, on several prior occasions, misplaced or mislaid your keys; such action implies irresponsibility."

"Unless my memory is really bad," McNaughton said, "they never said a word about keys in the staff workshop. Section III 9A says if keys are lost or stolen it's a big responsibility, but (it says) nothing about being terminated or paying for locks."

Section III 9A states, "Safeguard the master key at all times...since master keys will unlock many doors, the responsible use of these keys and the safeguarding of them cannot be overstressed."

"I think there has been an injustice done — an injustice to me, my (third floor) residents and I really believe to housing," McNaughton said.

"This is consistent with the way we handle things," Thomas Frith, director of housing, said. "I feel that we acted in the best interest of the residents in the hall, and that is our primary concern."

Lynn Bingham, freshman in engineering and resident of Boyd's third floor said, "It was kind of bad losing her right in the middle (of the academic year). All of a sudden she's not there to talk to. Everyone was sorry to see her go. She was a really good RA."

"Housing really did not have a choice," Bingham said. "They have their rules, and I guess they have to stick with them."

Carolyn Rhodes, freshman in interior design and floor resident, expressed concern about the room locks not being replaced. She said the housing department replaced the supply closet locks, the locks on the outside doors and some other locks, but the room locks have not been replaced.

"During the day when we're at class would be a prime time for someone to come up," Rhodes said. "We (residents) feel very uncomfortable. We could walk in from class and half of our stuff could be gone, and there's nothing we could do about it."

Frith said if there is concern, it should be brought to the attention of the hall director. The hall director can then take the concern to the housing department.

Lack of participation harms work study plan

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

The state college work study program, which began last fall, is suffering from a serious lack of participation for a variety of reasons, said Mark Tallman, executive director of the Associated Students of Kansas.

Under the program, the state provides funds to match employees' wages so local employers will be able to offer students jobs at half the expense. The program was established so students with financial need can obtain practical experience in a field in which they plan on working after graduation, said Robert Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance.

The Kansas Legislature provided K-State with an allocation of $70,531 at the end of its 1983 session. This would have provided $141,062 in total wages for students who could demonstrate financial need. But as of Jan. 4, only about $35,000 had been awarded to 17 students who are working with 14 participating employers, Evans said.

Tallman said participation in the program has been slow across the state. He gave several reasons for the lack of participation.

First, "the funds for the program were approved haphazardly," Tallman said. Usually, he said, state funds for financial aid are appropriated in the early spring, but the state college work study program funding was not approved until very late last spring.

Besides the late allocation date, Tallman said additional time was required for the state Department of Administration to approve the procedures and forms for the program.

Consequently, Tallman said employers did not have a good chance to assess their employment needs and gear up for the program.

Tallman also expressed hope that some "technical changes" would be made in the program's guidelines. For example, there is a question of how closely related a student's field of study should be to a possible employment position, he said.

He also said the need criteria established for participation in the program "may be a little too exclusive." He said it is difficult to find a student with enough financial need who happens to come from the right curriculum for an available position.

Another limitation keeping many employers from participating in the program is the requirement that any student position be new. The restriction is to keep any current employees from losing jobs to less expensive student help.

Tallman said the Legislature approved funding for the program without establishing a definite set of guidelines for its operation. A panel of financial aid officers from across the state then determined the appropriate criteria.

Evans acknowledged that if the work program received funding for continued operation, he would probably ask the Board of Regents' financial aid administrators to review the need criteria.

Evans said Gov. John Carlin had recommended funding for the same level of operation for the work program to the Legislature in his 1985 fiscal budget proposal.

Local employers participating in the state college work study program said they are pleased with the results they have obtained.

"It's worked out exceptionally well," said Gil Sabatka of Sabatka and Co. "We would not be anywhere near where we are now without it," he said, referring to the employment of a computer science student he added through the program.

Skydivers to lease plane from Hutchinson aviator

The K-State Parachute Club voted unanimously Thursday night to lease an airplane for an indefinite time.

A Cessna 182 will be leased from Dave Schneider of Hutchinson for $20 per hour. Schneider is also requiring the club to provide its own $15,000 insurance policy. This will be covered by a $690 premium for the $15,000, plus a $326 premium for liability, said Mark Young, graduate in chemistry and former president of the club.

The plane is expected to arrive sometime next week. It is currently undergoing minor repairs in Hutchinson. After the plane arrives, approximately one more week will be needed to install a jump door, Young said.

The club will store the plane at the Wamego airport. This is where most of the K-State skydivers jump.

First-time skydivers have jumped at Hutchinson in the past, but since arrangements have been made at Wamego with the new plane, students can jump there at less expensive rates.

Another of the club's improvements compared to last semester is the availability of pilots. There are four eligible pilots in Manhattan who have agreed to fly for the club, said Satish Singh, graduate in chemical engineering and current president of the club.

This semester, with more pilots and a plane available for use, club members hope jump every weekend the weather permits, Singh said.

Three die in weekend accidents

Three people were killed in weekend traffic accidents in Kansas, including an elderly Frontenac man who died after he was struck by a truck as he left a grocery store.

Authorities identified the victim as 92-year-old August Yartz. Yartz was hit by a delivery truck as he left the grocery, police said.

A 26-year-old Valley Falls man died late Friday night when the car he was driving left Kansas 16 west of his hometown and overturned. The Kansas Highway Patrol identified the victim as Darrell Darveaux.

A 26-year-old Cimarron man died late Friday when his car collided head-on with a tractor-trailer on U.S. 50, about nine miles west of Dodge City. He was identified as Dan Nelson.

Wolfman Jack returns to airwaves

PASADENA, Calif. — After an absence of a dozen years, Wolfman Jack is again howling over Los Angeles airwaves in the darkest hours of the night.

The gravelly-voiced disc jockey, whose wolf howls made him a radio legend in the early 1960s, has brought his unusual style to station KRLA in Pasadena, where, beginning early Sunday, he began haunting the midnight-to-5 a.m. shift six nights a week.

"They'll be howlin' in L.A., bay-bee," said the Wolfman, who will be 45 on Jan. 21.

The Wolfman gained fame at XERB, the station that blasted all across the western United States in the 1960s from its 250,000-watt transmitter nine miles south of the Rio Grande in Mexico.

For much of the past decade he was a fixture on the NBC's old late-night television program, "The Midnight Special." His syndicated radio show is heard on some 180 U.S. outlets and more than 1,400 stations in 52 countries.

He said he decided to accept the job at KRLA — which is owned by his good friend, Bob Hope — because "they do call themselves the heart and soul of rock 'n' roll. And I been doing business with 'em a long time."

GOP tennis win may be omen

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — The Republicans drubbed the Democrats 86-43 in the 11th annual U.S. Senators' Cup tennis tournament here, and GOP team captain Charles H. Percy said the lopsided score may be an omen for 1984.

"We've been saying all along that this is an important year to win because it's an election year and everything counts," said Percy, R-Ill. "We hope this is symbolic of what will happen in November. Of course, the Democrats aren't buying it. They're saying this has nothing to do with November. But we say it's a good indication."

The Democrats trailed 57-24 by the 1 p.m. lunch break and "it was all downhill from there," said Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, D-La., who served as his party's team captain for Saturday's game.

Despite the huge early lead, Percy would not concede victory, nor Johnston defeat — even though most of the 500 fans in attendance left after the celebrity doubles matches featuring television talk show host Merv Griffin and former Secretary of State Alexander Haig against comedian Lonnie Shorr and actress Eva Gabor.

"In Cook County, we don't count things until the last one's in. And then we count it 10 times," Percy said.

Lectures offer political, public issues

By KARLA PORTER
Staff Writer

The Landon Lecture Series is one way K-State students can hear first-hand views on public and political issues. The series, named in honor of former Kansas governor and presidential candidate Alfred Landon, provides a forum for noted persons to speak on topics of public interest.

Sponsorship of the series is provided entirely by Landon Patron memberships, said William Richter, series chairman and professor of political science.

"Anyone can become a patron who wishes to," Richter said. "Originally it was a group of local citizens who were appealed to for support. Currently, we have approximately 400 patrons."

A patron's contribution of $75 entitles him to a reserved seat at each lecture and attendance at a luncheon with the speaker after the lecture, Richter said.

"When we had fewer patrons, it provided much closer contact with the speaker. Now, it still provides more of a feeling of having met the speaker, whether or not you actually say 'hello' to the person or not," Richter said.

The patron fund is used to pay transportation and boarding expenses for the speaker, promotional activities and other series expenses, Richter said. In a few cases, he said, the fund is used to pay the speaker a personal honorarium or fee.

Richter said he doesn't usually reveal speakers' fees, but did say the largest honorarium a Landon speaker has been paid is $5,000. Most speakers ask only that their expenses be paid, he said.

The series coordinators usually try to get from three to six speakers a year, Richter said. Past speakers have come from a variety of professions, from journalists, to foreign oil ministers, to presidents.

"We decide whom we want and we go after them," Richter said. "In some cases it may take years to make necessary arrangements."

"(Edward) Kennedy, for instance, we've been attempting to get for at least the three years I've been working with the series," he said. "With President Reagan we started very shortly after I became involved in the series, and it took a couple of years in his case."

Sen. Edward Kennedy is to give the first of the Landon lectures scheduled for this semester.

Richter said suggestions for speakers come from many sources. Each suggestion is brought up to an advisory group consisting of the student body president, faculty senate president, chairman of the (University) Convocation series and chairman of the Landon patrons. In addition, Richter said he usually consults with people in the area of the speaker's expertise.

After a speaker has been approved, the first step to getting him is for President Duane Acker to write a letter of invitation, he said. At about the same time, Richter calls the speaker's office to determine if there is any interest.

Getting the speaker to agree to come is the easy part, he said. Finding a mutually convenient date is more difficult.

"On our end of it, that means finding dates when the (McCain) Auditorium is available; finding dates when (University) President Acker is going to be in town; finding dates when I'm going to be in town; finding dates when we can either get the ballroom in the Union or an alternative place for 400 people to meet for lunch," Richter said.

On the other end are the various complications involved with speakers' schedules, he said.

"We often will sit down over the telephone and I'll have my calendar and the scheduling secretary on the other end will have his or her calendar," he said, "and we'll just run through 'Well, no, that date isn't available. What about such-and-such?' over the next several months."

Sometimes an agreeable date can never be found, he said. In other cases, last-minute complications prevent speakers from meeting an engagement. Last semester, for instance, three Landon lectures were scheduled, but all had to cancel, he said.

This semester's speakers, Kennedy; Hodding Carter III, former spokesman for the State Department; and Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley, are all Democrats, which Richter said is pure coincidence.

"Some of the active Republicans among the patrons have pointed that out to me," he said. "Over the years, if there is a bias in the series, it has been more toward Republicans. We've had, I think, a lot more Republicans than Democrats."

come you never have any Democrats?" he said. "It balances out in the long run."

One aspect of the series which has not balanced out is the proportion of women speakers to men, Richter said.

Of the 63 Landon speakers, including the three scheduled for this semester, only two have been women.

"It has been a goal throughout the three years I've been involved with the series to get more women," Richter said. "We're not doing it just simply to get women, but to provide more balance."

Richter said of the several dozen women he has contacted about the series, several have been scheduled but were not able to come. Getting prominent women speakers has been extremely difficult, he said.

Plain & simple FAN! He's one dedicated

He smiled as he remembered the Wildcats of the early 1970s.

"I can remember when there used to be fist-fights over the last few remaining basketball tickets," he said. "I even saw some girls get in a fist-fight over tickets once."

But Robert Lipson, 1709 Laramie, said he can't understand the attitude of the student body now, a student body which he said, "lacks the punch of Wildcat fans of the past."

Lipson said he doesn't understand why Ahearn Field House is not the same compact sports arena which at one time generated an explosion of excitement and memories, or why there is not more support for the football team. He contended the teams are still capable of winning a national championship in the near future.

Lipson cited many reasons for the faltering spirit. First, life is easier today for students than it used to be, he said. Reserved seating has also hurt the fan power because "it eliminated those exciting camp-outs and long lines days before home games" which helped impress recruits, he said.

Lipson said he still has faith in K-State students. If the students make Saturday's game against Oklahoma a sell-out, his faith in them will be restored; if not, Lipson said, "I have absolutely no use for them whatsoever."

"They (K-State students) are just useless, lackadaisical mush unless they can prove themselves to me this Saturday," Lipson said.

Lipson began his interest in K-State basketball and football in 1972 when he arrived in Manhattan from Liberty, N.Y. after attending a two-year agricultural and technical school at Long Island, N.Y.

He came to K-State to do further study in biology. He now works as a general laborer.

Lipson has two self-proclaimed jobs when it comes to K-State sports — fan and recruiting aide.

"Football is 85 percent emotional. I go to practices and meetings to work on that 85 percent. That's my job. I consider it my responsibility, and that is a lot of responsibility," he said.

For the other job he carries around a stockpile of articles about K-State fan power, dating back to the first K-State vs. University of Kansas football game in 1902. He said he is just helping out with the recruiting program. By using some of those articles, Lipson said there will be athletes waiting in line to sign at K-State.

"Old articles displaying awesome fan-power is the single most important thing to recruiting," Lipson said. "Tony Jordan came here. I gave these to Tony Jordan; Tony Jordan is here."

Tony Jordan, freshman in pre-professional secondary education, said he remembers talking to Lipson as a prospective recruit and admitted he was somewhat influenced by the articles. Jordan said Lipson constantly tells Jordan he's going to be better than Marcus Dupree, a former Heisman Memorial Trophy candidate.

Lipson has travelled to all the away conference football games since 1973. He has 39 to his credit, he said.

In the early days he said he hitchhiked to games, but that got aggravating. Now he drives his AMC Hornet. Hanging around the parking lot talking to people or going to familiar hangouts is part of the fun, he said.

Lipson, however, remains most critical about the low ticket sales at basketball games and the general lack of excitement.

"If this was 10 years ago, given the same situation, this gym would be sold out. The fans would be yelling and screaming like crazy," he said.

If a person would try to recognize Lipson at a basketball game, one might imagine a screaming wildman with his face painted purple. Not so, said Lipson.

"When the team comes on the floor I just sit there," he said. "Even when the team is starting to score points I'll just sit there and watch. If they make a slam dunk, I might wave my banner."

"I'm a very lackadaisical fan at home, but I'm entitled to that because I go to all the conference road football games. The undergraduates aren't entitled to that. They've got to earn their keep here. They have to keep up the tradition," he said.

Jack Hartman, who said Lipson's been around for as long as he can remember, described Lipson as "just a dyed-in-the-wool K-State fan."

"I'm not the best fan, I'm not the biggest fan here at Kansas State," Lipson said. "I'm an unselfish fan. There are many others like me here at K-State, but they are just not as well known as me." Ask Lipson what the worst team in the Big Eight is and his reply will be a chuckle. "Do you even need to ask? I hate KU. Jack Hartman is going to kick Larry Brown's butt across the basketball floor." Lipson said that while he had great respect for former KU basketball coach Ted Owens, he considers Brown a hot-dog of a coach, and characterized Hartman as "just a good old country boy."

Lipson claims that with 39 consecutive Big Eight road game tickets, "When I speak, the athletic director listens."

While this week will be do-or-die for K-State students to keep Lipson's respect, he said his own plans for the future consist of waiting for the reader-printer copying machine at the library to get fixed. This will enable him to copy more articles and continue his recruiting crusade, which he said is going to produce two national championships in basketball and football.

Lipson said the players should remember that it is not the best team on the floor that wins, but the team that comes best prepared to play, both physically and emotionally.

"Therefore when the game begins, our players must fight the opponents right down into the floor just like a bunch of vicious dogs," he said.

"Jack has been too easy on them," he said. "Jack, get your whip out and use it."

'Cats display tight defense in 59-44 victory

K-State's center Alex Williams finds an outlet after being surrounded by the pressure defense of the University of Southern Colorado Indians during the first half of Saturday's game. Williams, in his second start, scored 10 of K-State's first 12 points to help the Wildcats defeat the Indians 59-44.

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

K-State, backed by a ball-hawking full-court defense, put away the Southern Colorado Indians, 59-44, in men's basketball action at Ahearn Field House Saturday night.

K-State, now 8-5 on the season, was at its best defensively, limiting Southern Colorado to a season-low 44 points on 33 percent shooting from the floor. The Wildcats' full-court pressure forced 17 Indian turnovers in the contest, 10 in the decisive first half.

On the offensive end, the K-State front court tandem of freshman center Alex Williams and junior forward Eddie Elder combined for 33 points. Williams was hot early, as he hit 12 of his 15 points in the opening half. Freed by Williams' strong inside play, Elder was open for jumpers from the wings, hitting a team-high 18 points while grabbing 13 rebounds.

The beginning of the game belonged to Williams. The burly 6-foot-7 center took six of the team's first seven shots from the field, hitting four inside attempts and drawing a pair of personal fouls for a total of 10 points. Led by Williams' play, the 'Cats jumped to an early 12-4 lead.

Williams said going inside to him early was not particularly part of K-State's game plan.

"It was just open inside. It was part of the offense," he said. "Things just kind of opened up unexpectedly, and I was there to put it in."

The Indians, thanks to two buckets by 6-foot-8 senior forward Benny Johnson, fought back to trail by four at 12-8. Johnson was one of the few offensive bright spots for the Indians, tallying 20 points.

Juniors Tom Alfaro and Lafayette Watkins came off the bench to re-ignite the 'Cats offense. For Alfaro, coming off the bench is a new experience since he started K-State's first 11 games, but he canned six of the team's next 10 points — Elder adding the other four — to give the 'Cats a 22-12 lead. Watkins and sophomore guard Jim Roder helped pad the lead as Watkins canned three jumpers and Roder added a 17-footer to forge K-State to a 30-16 lead. The 'Cats took a 34-20 lead into the locker room at the half.

The second half was more of the same. The 'Cats kept up the defensive pressure while different players helped the team keep its lead.

After Southern Colorado's Johnson opened up the scoring, Williams again took charge with a three-point play for the 'Cats. Two baskets by the Indians cut K-State's margin, but Alfaro again hit three straight shots from outside to give the 'Cats a 45-30 lead with 12:03 remaining.

Elder hit the team's next four hoops. A powerful slam dunk closed out his run, giving K-State a 51-38 lead with 5:30 to play.

The teams traded points the rest of the way. An Elder jumper rounded out the scoring, bringing the final score to 59-44.

Southern Colorado Coach Don McIntosh was impressed with K-State's play.

"They're a real good team; they really are well coached," he said. "I think they could stay with anyone in the country if they can stick with their stuff."

K-State's physical play hurt his Division II squad, McIntosh said.

"It was a little bit rougher than what we were used to as far as physical contact. We're not used to that kind of contact on our offensive pattern," McIntosh said. "We had a hard time adjusting."

The Ahearn crowd of 8,050, this season's largest, also intimidated the Indians, McIntosh said.

K-State Coach Jack Hartman gave his squad a mixed review.

"We saw some things that were encouraging," he said. "We saw a few good things offensively, and we did play well defensively. We made a pretty good basketball team get away from their game."

Hartman wasn't totally pleased, however.

"We've not been the same team since we left for the holidays. We've been tentative and had a hesitancy," he said. "There was one play that typifies our outlook when Eric (Watson, junior guard) got the ball on a break and put his head down and dribbled sideways. We're not thinking of going to the hole with it, we're going laterally."

Williams, hitting 10 of 11 shots in his two starts, is one of the few exceptions to that outlook. Elder was pleased by Williams' performance.

"Alex is much more confident in the post, and that frees me up to come outside," he said. "He has got some fine moves down there. We have a much greater threat with Alex down there, and that frees up the rest of us."

Williams said he was more comfortable in his second start than he was in his first start against Eastern Washington.

"I'm playing with more confidence. I feel like I can play every game more confidently," he said. "It psychs me up more to start then coming off the bench."

'Skins coach, staff searching for special play, formation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Washington Redskins' brain trust is looking for a new idea.

Coach Joe Gibbs and his staff have been working long hours in preparation for next Sunday's Super Bowl game against the Los Angeles Raiders. They have been looking for a new play or a new formation that could help bring the Redskins a second straight National Football League championship.

"These are the games that make coaching worthwhile," said Gibbs, "getting a chance to prepare your team for the biggest game of the year." Gibbs was named The Associated Press' National Football League Coach of the Year for a second consecutive season.

A disciple of San Diego Chargers' Coach Don Coryell, Gibbs has perfected Coryell's passing schemes and combined them with a solid running game at Washington to produce the most potent offense in league history.

The Redskins' offensive play book lists 500 plays and formations.

"That may not be enough," Gibbs said. "With two weeks to prepare for the game, your opponents can spot every flaw, take away the things you do best."

The things the Redskins do best are to give the ball to running back John Riggins, who rushed for an NFL record 24 touchdowns this season, and have Joe Theismann pass to Charlie Brown, the National Conference's leading receiver with 72 catches.

Prior to last year's Super Bowl game against Miami, Gibbs and his assistants spent countless hours formulating ways to stop Dolphins' linebacker A.J. Duhe. Duhe had been most instrumental in the victory over the New York Jets in the American Conference championship game.

Four days before the game, while meeting in a hotel room after midnight, the coaches hit upon an idea.

"It suddenly came to us to put everybody in motion at the same time," said Gibbs, who presented his "explode package" to his players on the Thursday before the game.

"The players loved it and picked it up right away," Gibbs said. "During the game, the 'all-movement' would freeze Duhe for an instant, taking away his quick pursuit."

The Redskins won the game 27-17, establishing Gibbs as one of pro football's best coaches.

"The man we fear most is not John Riggins, Joe Theismann or Charlie Brown, but Gibbs," said Raiders' All-Pro cornerback Lester Hayes.

Hayes credited Gibbs with turning Redskins' receivers from good to "semi-great" with his intricate passing patterns and formations.

The Redskins, who enjoyed a rare Sunday off, resume practice today. The team will leave for Tampa, Fla., site of Super Bowl XVIII, tonight.

Let's see 'fan power'

I have asked for this space in today's Collegian to address you personally, because it is of the utmost importance that I do so. I didn't want to tell you these things, because nobody ever had to tell the student body I was part of anything at all, at anytime whatsoever. However, these things must be told, because what has to be done, has to be done. It is all about what being part of the student body at K-State is all about.

The K-State student fans have traditionally been the very best basketball fans to be found anywhere in the country. It should mean something to you to be part of this great tradition. It should be your responsibility to keep this wonderful tradition going.

However, the support the basketball team is getting from this year's student body is deplorable. Look here, let's face the facts. The total enrollment here is about 19,000. According to Carol Adolph — who is in charge of ticket sales — only about 2,800 student season tickets have been sold. So what seems to be the matter with the rest of you 16,200? You knew that last year's team was young and the going would be rough. It has happened here before. You should know that they would only improve. So is there any reason to stay away? What kind of hypocrites are you to let our tradition falter like that? How could you disgrace yourselves like that? You ought to be downright ashamed of yourselves!

Let me advise the University community that the football coaches have been most successful in bringing in some of the most highly sought after football prospects in the country for a recruiting visit this weekend. Just how good are these prospects? Well, according to the coaches, these prospects are better than this season's Nebraska senior starters were when they were prospects. The Big Red (Oklahoma and Nebraska) are fighting over these recruits along with everyone else. We are very fortunate to get them to visit us. So what do we have to show for ourselves to compete for their commitments to play football here instead of Oklahoma or Nebraska? It should be our tradition of awesome fan power. This is the one advantage we enjoy over the Big Red and everyone else in the nation. It is a terrific advantage. It is the best reason for recruits to come here, because it is not where you win the national championship that's most important, but the caliber of people you win it for. Therefore, we must use that advantage for all it's worth, so we can win that national championship here. If you want any kind of winning success to occur here, the following things must be done at the basketball game this Saturday against Oklahoma. They are the same things that were done when I was an undergraduate here during and before the '70s.

ROBERT LIPSON
Guest Columnist

1. You must sell out Ahearn at once, and definitely before Saturday.

2. You will all rise up, wave your arms and yell frantically whenever the Wildcats appear to falter, and never stop until the end.

3. All of you shall remain until the very end of the game — no matter what happens.

4. If OU is fortunate and the Wildcats stub their toes at the end, you shall stand and cheer them vigorously as they leave the floor. You should do this no matter how badly the team loses.

5. If the Wildcats manage to pull the game out at the end, all of you shall rush out onto that floor in jubilant rejoicing and triumph, just as if it were the national championship, to convince these football recruits that we're the best. Bring your toilet paper rolls and purple crepe paper rolls, but don't throw them out until the horn goes off.

6. You shall be willing to do these things at all home games from now on — no matter how the Wildcats do — because it will make a significant difference in the outcome of the games.

Just exactly how great were the student body fans of my time? I couldn't even begin to describe them to you. They were just absolutely awesome. I hope OU does lead us during the game, so that these football recruits can see for themselves just exactly what our awesome fan power can do. If you want to even begin to compare yourselves to your predecessors here in the '70s, then it will be through the sheer force of your determination and enthusiasm that you will turn the tide of the battle on the court toward our favor.

Now understand, once and for all, that we did not allow ourselves to lose in Ahearn. We motivated our teams on the floor, and they responded. Opponents felt the pressure. We never gave up. I can remember more than once when the Wildcats were behind by as many as 13 points with under six minutes to play, and still pulled the game out. I can prove it to anyone.

So you may not be the best fans we have ever had. However, for this game Saturday, and the great opportunity to help the school show these recruits that you are the best fans to play for once again and from now on, rise to the occasion.

Raider ready to 'get after it'

By The Associated Press

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. — Mickey Marvin and Dave Butz are going to see a lot of each other in Super Bowl XVIII. Marvin is looking forward to the get-together.

"I'm going to see No. 65 lined up in my face, and he's going to see No. 65 lined up in his face," said Marvin, an offensive guard for the Los Angeles Raiders. "I know he's not going to trick me and I'm not going to trick him."

Marvin said he believes that Butz, the 6-foot-7, 295-pound defensive tackle, is one of the National Football League's finest at his position. Butz, of the Washington Redskins, will play across from him in next Sunday's Super Bowl at Tampa, Fla.

"Dave is a great football player. I think he's one of the three best defensive tackles in the league, along with Randy White (of Dallas) and Doug English (of Detroit)," said Marvin, a 6-4, 270-pounder. "I like to play against people like him."

"It's going to be a great challenge. He's a throw-back to the old days — just line up and get after it. I think I'm that way, too."

Marvin said he believes that the Redskins are going to see a Raiders' team much different from the one that blew a 35-20 fourth-quarter lead in dropping a 37-35 decision at Washington Oct. 2.

"We gave up some sacks and had some turnovers in that game," said the seven-year NFL veteran from the University of Tennessee. "We're going to change that."

"We (the Los Angeles offensive line) always had confidence in ourselves and confidence in each other; as a group, we never lost confidence. It took time for us to feel comfortable together. You have to have a cohesive unit."

Speaking of the ups-and-downs experienced by the offensive line this season, Marvin said, "We take the burden on our shoulders as a group. I think that's what separates the Raiders from the rest of the league."

"I feel like each week our offensive line has gotten better, both individually and as a unit," he said. "I think that's evidenced by the way we played against Pittsburgh and Seattle."

After allowing 55 sacks in their 16 regular-season games, the Raiders gave up only three in beating the Steelers 38-10 and the Seahawks 30-14 in the play-offs.

"We're going to set the tone for the Super Bowl," said Marvin, speaking of the offensive line. "I'm looking forward to it, to say the least."

McEnroe stops Lendl to net Volvo tourney

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Dominating the court with cat-like quickness, John McEnroe defused Ivan Lendl's power game Sunday and captured the $400,000 Volvo Masters tennis championship with a 6-3, 6-4, 6-4 victory.

The triumph over the two-time defending Masters champion was worth $100,000 to McEnroe. Lendl collected $60,000 as he reached the final of this season-ending tournament for the fourth consecutive year.

McEnroe's serve produced six aces and numerous other winners.

Lendl boomed four aces, and his powerful topspin groundstrokes off both sides were deep.

Only six games in the nearly two-hour match went to break point — and McEnroe won them all. He broke Lendl in the sixth game of the first set, the third game of the second set and the third game of the final set.

Lendl reached break point on McEnroe's service once in each set. And each time, the left-hander from New York fought off the challenge.

Neither player was in trouble until the sixth game, when Lendl, up 30-0, hit two forehands wide. McEnroe was quick to take advantage, rifling a backhand service return cross court.

It was the match's first break point, and McEnroe closed out the game by jumping on Lendl's second serve and whipping it down the line.

In the ninth game, McEnroe's backhand volley sailed long, giving Lendl break point at 40-30. But McEnroe, playing a perfect serve-and-volley game, pulled to deuce with a forehand volley, took the advantage with an ace — his fourth of the match — and closed out the opening set with an overhead smash.

Lendl tried to put pressure on McEnroe by coming to the net more, but the tactic backfired. A forehand volley that was long gave McEnroe a 40-15 lead in the third game of the second set. Two points later, McEnroe had his second break of the match.

Lendl again tried to break back in the 10th game, taking the advantage with a powerful forehand service return that McEnroe volleyed long. But his sixth ace pulled McEnroe back to deuce and a service winner gave him the ad point.

Lendl hit what appeared to be a perfect shot near the left sideline. But McEnroe raced to the ball and flicked a forehand half-volley cross-court, closing out the second set and, for all practical purposes, the match.

McEnroe broke Lendl at 15 in the third game, won the last three points when Lendl reached break point on McEnroe's service in the eighth game, then closed out the match in the 10th game, the final three points coming on service winners.

Bruins stumble against Oregon, 62-51

By The Associated Press

For the University of Oregon's basketball team, it was a weekend to remember. UCLA Coach Larry Farmer would rather forget it.

"The game was played on a very emotional level, especially by Oregon. We just didn't play at that level," Farmer said, after Oregon upset his sixth-ranked Bruins 62-51 Saturday.

The victory was the first for Oregon over UCLA in seven years — a streak that covered 12 games.

"It was a great afternoon for the players, the fans and the students, but especially the players," Oregon Coach Don Monson said.

Oregon's upset was one of three involving Top 20 teams Saturday, as 18th-ranked Boston College edged No. 10 St. John's 69-67 and Alabama defeated No. 15 Georgia 65-60.

In other action involving the nation's ranked teams, No. 1 North Carolina beat No. 12 Wake Forest 70-62; No. 3 DePaul routed Alabama-Birmingham 98-63; fifth-ranked Maryland beat Duke 81-75; No. 7 Houston defeated Texas A&M 70-64; No. 8 Texas-El Paso trimmed Hawaii 74-54, and No. 9 Illinois edged Ohio State 55-53.

Also, No. 11 Louisiana State drubbed Mississippi 93-70; No. 14 Nevada-Las Vegas beat Utah State 93-88; 16th-rated Oregon State downed Southern California 51-45; 17th-ranked Oklahoma overwhelmed Nicholls State 107-51; No. 19 Memphis State defeated Southern

Blair Rasmussen scored 18 of his 20 points in the second half, leading Oregon's victory.

Michael Adams tossed in eight straight free throws to boost Boston College over St. John's. Adams' free throws with four seconds left proved to be the winning margin.

Craig Dudley hit four free throws in the final two minutes, clinching Alabama's victory over Georgia. Georgia never led after 8:12 into the first half, although the Bulldogs tied the score three times in the second half. The last tie came at 56 with 4:43 left, but Alabama's Darrell Neal scored on a dunk shot, putting the Crimson Tide ahead for good.

"The difference in the game was getting key rebounds, especially on offense," Alabama Coach Wimp Sanderson said. Sam Perkins scored 17 points, sparking North Carolina's victory over Wake Forest and extending the Tar Heels' winning streak to 12 games.

With the Demon Deacons trailing 58-57 after a Delaney Rudd jump shot with 5:42 left in the second half, Perkins scored on an alley-oop shot 20 seconds later. He also hit a hook shot with 4:52 remaining, giving North Carolina a 62-57 lead, and Wake Forest never got closer than two points.

"It feels good that we're capable of coming back," Perkins said. "We saw a lot of defenses coming at us. Wake did everything it possibly could."

Tyrone Corbin scored 25 points, leading DePaul over Alabama-Birmingham. DePaul, 13-0 and one of only four NCAA Division I teams still unbeaten, improved its record on its home court to 99-3 since the late 1970s.

Len Bias scored 17 points, leading a strong inside attack as Maryland defeated Duke.

Duke Coach Mike Krzyzewski said his youthful Blue Devils couldn't overcome Maryland's experience.

Akeem Olatunwo scored 27 points, grabbed 13 rebounds and blocked 10 shots, helping Houston beat Texas A&M. The victory extended Houston's Southwest Conference winning streak to a record 29 games.

Kent Lockhart scored 14 points as Texas-El Paso improved its record to 15-0 by trouncing Hawaii. Efram Winters and Bruce Douglas scored 12 points apiece as Illinois rallied to beat Ohio State.

Student financial funds decrease after 20-year continuous growth

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The amount of financial aid available for college students, after two decades of rapid growth, has dropped by $2 billion in the past two years, the College Board said Sunday.

The decline from a peak of $18 billion in 1981-82 is even greater if inflation is taken into account, according to "Trends in Student Aid: 1963 to 1983," a study prepared by the board's Washington office.

Allowing for inflation, the real value of student aid has dropped 21 percent in the 1980s, the board said in the study funded by the Ford Foundation.

The report traced most of the decline to the 1981 decision by the Reagan administration and Congress to phase out Social Security benefits for college students, to restrictions on eligibility for Guaranteed Student Loans and to a drop in the use of veterans benefits.

But that decrease comes after a period in which "the federal government became by far the largest contributor to student aid. Almost 80 percent of total assistance now comes through federal programs; less than 40 percent of aid in the early '60s was federal in origin," the study said.

The amount of aid from federal, state and institutional sources surged ed from $546 million in 1963-64 to $4.5 billion in 1970-71, to $10.5 billion in 1975-76 and to more than $18 billion in 1981-82. It dropped to an estimated $16.1 billion in the current academic year.

Even after adjusting for inflation, the growth in student aid has been dramatic. In terms of what the dollar was worth in 1982, there was $1.7 billion in aid available in 1963-64, $10.9 billion by 1970-71 and $18.2 billion by 1975-76, the study said.

The value of student aid dipped for several years until Congress passed the Middle Income Student Assistance Act in 1978, then "fell off again at the beginning of the 1980s," it said.

Veterans' benefits began to decline in the mid-1970s as Vietnam-era veterans began using up their eligibility.

The report noted major shifts in the ratio of grants versus loans.

"From 1970-71 to 1975-76, grant aid increased from 66 percent to 80 percent of total aid awarded, while loans decreased from 29 to 17 percent," it said. "This pattern reversed itself in the mid-1970s."

Grants and loans now account for 48 percent of the aid each, while work-study programs provide the remaining 4 percent.

Student aid increased more than five times faster than college expenditures in the past two decades and also outpaced enrollment growth.

The board said the annual cost of tuition, room and board at private universities climbed from $2,105 in 1963-64 to $8,537 in 1982-83. For public universities, the cost went from $1,026 to $3,403.

Man designs Marine shrine

By The Associated Press

OSCEOLA, Ark. — An unemployed newspaper carrier who was horrified by television reports of the terrorist bombing of Marines in Lebanon spent $2,000 saved from his former job to build a memorial that was dedicated before 500 people Sunday.

"This project came from my heart and from a low bank account," Allen Starr, 49, of Osceola, said in a telephone interview Sunday evening.

Starr, who served in the Navy during the Korean War, said he also has willed his estate to a scholarship foundation for the children of the Marine casualties. Starr is not married and has no children.

Although he did not know any of the 242 servicemen who were killed in the Oct. 23 blast, Starr said he was inspired to build a memorial after watching news reports of the devastation.

"I saw it on television, and I said to myself, 'My God, this looks like another Pearl Harbor,'" he said.

About 500 people gathered in Florida Park on Sunday afternoon for the dedication of the memorial, a brick wall 8 feet high and 4 feet wide bearing a bronze plaque that says, "Let us forget that peace has a price."

Among the military officials who spoke at the ceremony in this eastern Arkansas town of 8,371 was Col. R.B. Johnston, commanding officer of the 8th Marines, 2nd Marine Division at Camp Lejeune, N.C. Johnston, the commanding officer of the Marines in Lebanon at the time of the blast, said the memorial was the first to be dedicated to the Marine casualties in Lebanon.

Starr obtained permission from Mayor Dick Prewitt and the City Council to put the wall in the city park, and had it built from used bricks. On either side of the wall, two columns rise about 8 inches above its top. In each is a hole for a vase for visitors to put flowers. Starr landscaped the memorial site with dwarf pine trees and other plants from his own yard.

Starr was especially proud, he said, that Marine Col. L.G. Clapp of Memphis, one of the speakers at Sunday's ceremony, made him an honorary Marine. "I'd rather have that than a handshake from the president," he said.

Starr's mother, who died about 6½ years ago, left a home filled with antiques that he said is valued at about $225,000. "I had my attorney write up my will, and I left my entire estate to the widows of the Marines in Beirut for their children's college educations," Starr said. A Marine scholarship foundation in Princeton, N.J., is compiling names. "There are 25 so far," Starr said.

Historic French bookstore stays busy

By The Associated Press

PARIS — When Ezra Pound was dismissing Gertrude Stein as "an old tub of guts" and Ernest Hemingway caged coffee at Scott Fitzgerald's heels, all paused for books at Shakespeare and Company. The historic bookshop-library is still here. Sort of.

Once a genteel literary salon, it is now a jumble of knapsacks, tattered manuscripts, dog fur and cups of chicken soup balanced precariously among 50,000 books, new, old and ancient.

Upstairs is the "Tumbleweed Hotel," 11 beds fitted among jammed shelves of rare books, free to anyone who can persuade the proprietor he or she would be a writer if any spare muse happened to turn up.

Doors are open noon to midnight, seven days a week.

Business is brisk but profits go into plates of fish stew for itinerant guests. The paid library has been discontinued, but those with trustworthy faces are loaned books for free.

"Anyone with a mentality like mine deserves to be bankrupt," says George Whitman, the owner. "But we're expanding."

Whitman exudes carefully nurtured eccentricity, tugging at a yellowish wisp of a goatee and scratching at his 75-cent rummage sale blue sweater. He pickles peaches and avoids dentists.

At 70, he is proud of his 2-year-old daughter, Sylvia Beach Whitman.

The original Sylvia Beach, daughter of a Princeton, N.J., minister, opened Shakespeare and Company in 1919. She published James Joyce's "Ulysses" when everyone else dismissed it as filthy.

Her original shop on the Rue de l'Odeon — a mile from Whitman's location — was the reading room for literati on the way up or already there: Dos Passos, MacLeish, Anderson, Wilder, E.E. Cummings, T.S. Eliot, Fitzgerald, Hemingway, Stein, Ford Madox Ford.

Her mantel mailboxes antedated American Express, and she loaned so much to down-and-out writers that she called her place the Left Bank.

Once, a crazed Baconian nearly smashed up the place — he thought Shakespeare was a fake and preferred Francis Bacon and Company — until her "best customer," Hemingway, stopped in for his morning visit.

For two decades, she faced every trial: the 1929 market crash that scared her customers back home, Joyce's high living out of her cashbox, the German entry into Paris in 1940.

But finally, when Beach refused to sell her only copy of Joyce's "Finnegans Wake" to a German officer, she had to hide her books and close down.

When Allied troops entered Paris, Hemingway raced to the Rue de l'Odeon and liberated Shakespeare and Company. He bellowed "Sylvia," and neighbors took up the chant until she appeared. He led a party onto the rooftops to clean out snipers and then went off to liberate the Ritz' wine cellar.

Beach lived above the shop until 1962, to the age of 75, but never reopened it.

In 1964, Shakespeare's 400th birthday, Whitman simply renamed the Mistral, his own bookstore. Beach had died two years earlier.

"We carried on the spirit so I thought we should also carry on the name," he says. Beach at least had been a regular visitor to his shop.

Whitman pays an assistant but relies on a ragtag army of volunteers to help around the place. Some leave familiar with the word "irascible," victims of tongue-lashing for work inadequately done.

Others are effusive in their thanks.

"It depends on how you catch him," remarks one frequent visitor. "Some days, he can be so charming, kind. Or he can be a real terror."

One volunteer housemother was Hemingway's granddaughter, Muffet. Another soon became Whitman's wife, Felicity, a lovely young English artist.

Beach's books and papers were sold to the State University of New York at Buffalo, and other institutions. But Whitman's rare English collection is perhaps the best on the continent, and he has thousands of volumes in Russian, German and Italian.

The hottest item is Hemingway's "Moveable Feast," which recalls Sylvia Beach in the early days: perhaps 1,000 copies a year.

Whitman studied journalism but, rather than take a job, set out to walk around the world. He got to Panama and then shipped to Hawaii. Eventually, after wartime service in Greenland, he opened a bookshop in Taunton, Mass., outside of Boston, and then pitched up in Paris.

The Mistral opened in 1951 on the Right Bank, but Whitman soon found his perfect spot — a monastery in the 1600s — on the Quai de Montebello.

For a decade, he has been threatening to bring out his memoirs, announced as "The Rag and Bone Bookshop of the Heart," from a line of W.B. Yeats.

"How do I see myself?" he muses, absent-mindedly setting his constant cigarette on a forgotten sign asking patrons to leave bags at the desk. "I am the spiritual descendant of Walt Whitman left here in Paris."

Study finds women out-earned spouses

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Nearly six million American wives earned more than their husbands in 1982, a sharp contrast with the traditional view of the wife as keeping house or supplementing her husband's earnings, according to a Census Bureau study released Sunday.

The study of Americans' income in 1982 found 3,997,000 couples in which both worked and the wife had a higher income, and another 1,933,000 in which the wife was the sole wage earner.

That makes the wife the primary income source for 12.1 percent of husband-wife households, the bureau reported.

Female participation in the labor force has increased steadily since World War II, rising from 20 percent of married women in 1947 to 51 percent in 1981.

With better education and more time in the labor force, women's earnings have also increased, although on average they still earn less than men. However, their earnings are becoming increasingly important to the family, according to the report by Suzanne M. Bianchi and Daphne Spain.

While 12.1 percent of all U.S. households had females as the primary wage earner, that figure rose to 19.5 percent among blacks; it dropped to 10 percent for Hispanics, the study showed.

There have been no previous studies of women's earnings compared with their husbands', but with their growing employment rates it seems reasonable to speculate that the share who earn more than their husbands has increased, Bianchi said in a telephone interview.

According to her report, two views have been proposed to explain wives who earn more than their husbands. One is the "female superstar," stressing the highly educated women in a professional job. The second is the "underachieving husband syndrome," where the husband earns less because of retirement, illness, layoff, or lack of initiative.

But, the authors concluded that while this "may be an interesting group" they account for only about 860,000 cases of wives outearning their husbands.

Buildup of arms forms 'safer' U.S.

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan, declaring that "1984 is a year of opportunities for peace," challenged the Soviet Union on Monday to revive nuclear arms control talks and said that fears of war are understandable but mistaken.

In an otherwise conciliatory speech, Reagan criticized Soviet violations of arms control agreements and the Kremlin's handling of human rights issues. But he stated that as a result of the military buildup of his first three years in office, "we are safer now."

Reagan's advisers acknowledged that the speech was intended to dispel impressions of the president as "warlike" in the face of concerns that his political standing could be damaged in the election year by a negative image of U.S.-Soviet relations.

The speech was given before an audience of top government officials and members of Congress and delivered by satellite in time for European evening news broadcasts. It opened a busy two-week period for Reagan. In coming days, he will deliver his State of the Union address, announce his political plans, and make two out-of-town trips as his participation in the 1984 presidential campaign picks up.

"I believe 1984 finds the United States in its strongest position in years to establish a constructive and realistic working relationship with the Soviet Union," the president said.

"The opportunity for progress in arms control exists; the Soviet leaders should take advantage of it," he said.

Meanwhile, a senior administration official, speaking on the condition that he not be identified by name, said the president continues to support research and development for an anti-ballistic missile system and that continuing funding is needed.

Reagan said the United States' military buildup may account for the "strident rhetoric from the Kremlin recently."

"These harsh words have led some to speak of heightened uncertainty and an increased danger of conflict," the president said. "This is understandable, but profoundly mistaken. Look beyond the words, and one fact stands out: America's deterrence is more credible and it is making the world a safer place; safer because now there is less danger that the Soviet leadership will underestimate our strength or question our resolve."

"We must and will engage the Soviets in a dialogue as serious and constructive as possible, a dialogue that will serve to promote peace in the troubled regions of the world, reduce the level of arms, and build a constructive working relationship."

"Our strength is necessary to deter war and to facilitate negotiated solutions," Reagan said. "Soviet leaders know it makes sense to compromise only if they can get something in return. America now offers something in return."

The speech occurred as Secretary of State George P. Shultz arrived in Stockholm, Sweden, for a meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and a 35-nation conference on easing East-West tensions. Shultz

Officials cite Salvadoran rights gains

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The State Department praised the Salvadoran government Monday for taking "unprecedented" action to curb rightist death squads and said the overall number of reported non-combat killings in that country fell sharply the last six months.

The administration hopes its finding of gains in protection of human rights in El Salvador will improve prospects for congressional approval of a coming request for a sharp increase in military aid.

While saying "continued abuse of human rights remains a central problem" in El Salvador, the department said non-combat deaths have declined progressively since reaching a peak in 1980.

Such killings fell from an average of 177 per month during the first half of 1983 to 104 per month in the last half, the report said, citing accounts in the Salvadoran press.

But several human rights groups said government-sponsored murder and torture continue unabated in El Salvador, and criticized the State Department's reliance on the Salvadoran press for its information.

Aryeh Neier, vice chairman of Americas Watch, cited figures compiled by an agency of the Roman Catholic Church that showed 2,615 civilians slain in the last six months of 1983 by the Salvadoran military and related paramilitary groups, up over the first six months of last year when 2,527 civilians were reported murdered.

The State Department said some figures from private groups show more civilian deaths, but added these groups often have strong political biases and generally link civilian and "battlefield" deaths.

President Reagan, mindful of congressional concerns over administration policy in El Salvador, asked the State Department to prepare the report for Congress after vetoing legislation last November that would have tied future military aid to El Salvador to progress in human rights.

In 1982 and 1983, Congress established a link between military aid and human rights. The Kissinger Commission on Central America, in its report last week, recommended the re-establishment of that condition.

But Reagan indicated last Saturday he would not accept an absolute requirement to cut off military aid to

Senate begins hearing Mahaffey's appeal today

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

The Faculty Senate appeal hearing of the dismissal of tenured professor Ben Mahaffey will begin today and could take more time than expected.

The hearing will begin at 9 a.m. in Union 212. The hearing is open to the public.

Because of the large number of exhibits both parties have, David Schauner, representing Mahaffey as the general counsel of the Kansas National Education Association, said Monday the hearing will stretch longer than this week.

"I can safely say we won't finish in four days. It's not physically possible to finish in four days" with about 250 exhibits between both parties, he said.

Mahaffey, the first tenured professor fired since the University adopted the American Association of University Professors' tenure guidelines in 1947 and possibly the first in the University's 120-year history, was recommended for dismissal and suspended from University duties Sept. 1.

An associate professor of forestry, Mahaffey was notified of the move Aug. 18 in a letter signed by Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry; David Mugler, assistant dean of instruction in the College of Agriculture; John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture and Owen Koeppel, University provost.

The letter stated Mahaffey's dismissal is based on "professional incompetence" and specific allegations outlined in the letter included:

"(1) A history of student complaints of intimidation, unfair grading practices and a sexist attitude.

"(2) Your creation of a classroom environment that reduced interest in course offerings and departmental programs.

"(3) Your unproductive and uncooperative relationships with Forestry Department personnel and administration."

The letter added, "Your performance in the areas described above has reduced the ability of the Kansas State University Department of Forestry to offer quality educational programs. Your relationship with many of your students has severely reduced the effectiveness of your teaching."

In the case's pre-hearing Dec. 13, the two parties met with the six-member committee selected by Faculty Senate to hear the case. Pete Cooper, professor of civil engineering and the committee's chairman, said then that although the hearing will somewhat resemble a court scene with lawyers representing both sides, the hearing is to be as informal as possible.

Representing K-State will be Richard Seaton, University attorney, who submitted a list of 37 witnesses who could be called during the hearing, 16 of whom are students. Diane Hull, a KNEA attorney who has handled the case's background, submitted a list of 48 witnesses.

Seaton said that even though his witness list was long, the University might not call everyone listed. He estimated Monday the hearing would last through the week.

Schauner also said Monday that he has shortened his list of witnesses to about 18 in the interest of time.

As part of his due process, Mahaffey had the right to appeal his dismissal and suspension to senate. But because this is the first dismissal of a tenured faculty member, senate had to establish procedures for the hearing. Those procedures were approved by senate in its Oct. 11 meeting.

Senate first established a committee to select 12 tenured faculty members from which the six members were selected by each party in the case by removing three names. From the six, one member is appointed as a non-voting chairman.

The committee will make a recommendation to President Duane Acker who will then make a recommendation to the Board of Regents on what action should be taken.

Kemp halts roadside park closings

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State Transportation Secretary John B. Kemp capitulated Monday in the face of sharp criticism from legislators, agreeing to halt the closing of roadside parks and rest areas in Kansas until the Legislature decides whether it wants any closed.

At the end of a 90-minute hearing before the House Transportation Committee, the secretary agreed to a moratorium on the closings.

Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, the committee's chairman, predicted legislation would be introduced this session to require the reopening of many of the parks and rest areas already closed.

"I'm delighted, needless to say," commented Rep. Rochelle Chronister, R-Neodesha, assistant House majority leader who sat in on part of the hearing. She had twice written open letters to Gov. John Carlin protesting the closings in southeast Kansas.

Kemp announced plans last fall to close 38 roadside facilities, transfer control of another 57 to local units of government and civic clubs and reduce the level of services at another 20, with the state keeping 79 of them open and moving in future years to upgrade them.

The secretary told the House committee Monday that of those which have been scheduled to be closed, negotiations had been completed since his November announcement under which another dozen would be transferred to local control, meaning 26 still would be closed.

However, he agreed after running into a bipartisan barrage of criticism from committee members to put at least a three-month moratorium on the closings, which already had begun.

Both Republicans and Democrats jumped on Kemp at the committee meeting, telling him Kansans are deeply upset over the closings, no matter how noble his goal had been in wanting to put the estimated $470,000 annual savings the closings would effect into repairing highways.

"I know you've dealt with a very difficult decision, and I know your motive is noble," Crowell told Kemp. "But I would request that until the Legislature has a chance to review the situation that you would see that no more are bulldozed or damaged beyond reclaiming."

Kemp agreed to "hold in limbo" the closings until the end of the session in April.

Several members of the committee told of seeing roadside parks and rest areas closed to different degrees, from having dirt piled in the driveway to having earthmoving equipment tear out the facilities.

They were more than a little upset about it.

"Didn't you know you'd get a legislative backlash, and a bipartisan one at that?" Crowell asked Kemp.

"I thought it was good, sound business to proceed as we did," replied Kemp, who said the Department of Transportation made a concerted effort to base decisions to close facilities on how much the public used them.

"I don't relish legislative backlashes on anything," Kemp added. "But if I allowed that to dictate my decisions there might be a lot of things that should be done that wouldn't get done.

"I guess I just felt like we needed our resources so badly on our primary highway system that that is where our money should go."

At one point, Kemp referred to some of the closed roadside facilities as "run-down, dirty outhouses," which he said did nothing to enhance the image of Kansas.

Crowell took issue with that statement, saying rest facilities he had frequently used near Lyndon and Fredonia in his trips to and from Topeka, which have been closed, "weren't outhouses."

Rep. Richard Harper, R-Fort Scott, said nothing in his nearly 20 years in the Legislature had generated more complaints from his constituents than the closing of a rest area west of Fort Scott. He said KDOT had dug out the entry way, torn up the asphalt drive "and made it so nobody could take it over."

Rep. Harold Guldner, R-Syracuse, said Kemp had "stirred up a hornet's nest as far as the rural-urban situation is concerned" because the closings mostly affect rural areas.

Rep. Ambrose Dempsey, D-Leavenworth, asked why KDOT never discussed with the Department of Corrections the possibility of using inmates to keep the parks and rest areas in good repair.

Rep. Larry Erne, D-Coffeyville, said the closings have left him no place to stop during the first 125 miles of his journey when he drives to Topeka at night.

The secretary suggested people should find facilities in the towns they pass through while traveling. Erne said those facilities aren't open at night.

Civil rights commission declares independence

By The Associated Press

HUNT VALLEY, Md. — The reborn U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, despite a majority that is expected to back President Reagan's conservative views, unanimously declared in a resolution Monday its independence "from the White House or any other group."

The resolution was introduced at the commission's first formal meeting by John H. Bunzel, one of the new commissioners expected to help steer the panel away from support of forced busing and affirmative action quotas.

With its four presidential and four congressional appointees, the panel replaces a presidentially appointed commission that still was independent of the White House since it was formed in 1957.

Bunzel said his motion was prompted by a news item last week, which quoted an unnamed White House official saying, "Now that we have the Civil Rights Commission on our side, we can make use of them to run some interference for us."

The resolution said the suggestion the commission sides with the White House "is untrue and is rejected out of hand. The commission will remain independent of all outside wishes or pressures, whether they come from the White House or any other group."

While the old commission constantly criticized Reagan's opposition to mandatory busing and quotas, five of the eight members on the reconstituted commission likely will support him on those issues.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, representing all major civil rights organizations, has said the new panel would follow the agenda of the radical right.

Panel Vice Chairman Morris Abram, a civil rights lawyer, said, "This commission will be one of the most independent bodies the country has seen. The prior commission, I think, was a very dependent body. It was dependent on the whims ... and direction of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights."

Bunzel added, "I think it's very important to establish very early, that the commissioners individually and collectively, are not following anybody's instructions, are not following anybody's pressures, and that we prize our independence."

The new commission has three old members. One, Blandina Cardenas Ramirez, was embroiled in a dispute with commission chairman Clarence Pendleton Jr., also a holdover member, at the outset of the meeting.

She objected when Pendleton, a Reagan appointee, welcomed members to the "new Civil Rights Commission," adding that Congress' creation of the panel "has the effect of extending something that already was, not having something that is new."

Associate professor writes book

William Miller, associate professor of architecture, is the author of "Alvar Aalto: An Annotated Bibliography," just published by Garland Publishing Inc., New York and London, as Volume 4 of the Garland Bibliographies in Architecture and Planning.

Miller's work, which contains items published as late as December 1980, includes material on Aalto, his architecture and his writing.

Miller precedes the body of his work with an essay sketching the architect's life and career, and the political, artistic and architectural contexts in which Aalto lived and practiced until his death in May 1976.

At K-State Miller has taught courses in history and design. He currently is coordinator of third-year design studio instruction in the Department of Architecture.

Miller received support for travel to the Avery Memorial Library at Columbia University and to the Frances Loeb Library at Harvard University through K-State's Bureau of General Research.

Surveys show satisfaction with Lafene

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

If two recent surveys provide any indication, K-State students have been very pleased with the services offered them by Lafene Student Health Center.

Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene, said the surveys were conducted to sample student opinions of the various services offered at the center.

The first survey, conducted by Educational Resources, polled 1,000 students in April 1983 as one part of a University evaluation of the facility.

"Last year was our year to be evaluated by the University, and one of the things they asked for was a consumer survey of those who had used the facility," Tout said.

Ronald Downey, director of Educational Resources, coordinated the survey, which was restricted to full-time students. This restriction was applied because full-time students are the only persons required to pay the health fee at Lafene, Tout said.

Downey said 29 percent of the students responding had used the facility since March 1982. Those 29 percent responded to a comprehensive list of 50 questions regarding items from waiting rooms to personal interaction with laboratory technicians.

The item students expressed the most displeasure with was the amount of time they had to wait before receiving medical attention, Downey said.

Tout said the problem is continually being remedied. "At the time the survey was taken, we were short-handed with regard to the number of physicians we had on staff," he said.

"We are now up to 10 physicians, and the problem is all but taken care of," Tout said.

Another item of concern to Tout and to some survey respondents was the attitude displayed by personnel at the center.

"We have told the people on our staff that regardless of how bad a day has been, they should try to smile while working with a patient," Tout said.

"We also have discussed, as doctors, taking the time to explain to students what medications and treatments we are prescribing," he said.

Downey said the survey showed areas of dissatisfaction to be minor in comparison to those areas in which students were satisfied.

The large majority of students were 'very pleased' or 'satisfied' with the health services, Downey said. There were only eight questions on which 10 percent of the respondents were dissatisfied, he said.

Tout said several students attached personal comments to their survey form. Most comments related to individual doctors and other support personnel.

"Every week I receive at least one letter from a student who is pleased with the care he or she received from a particular member of our staff, and there were several such notes attached to the survey that Educational Resources conducted," Tout said.

The second survey was conducted by Lew Shannon, an administrative intern with the Office of the Vice President of Student Affairs. The survey consisted of phone interviews with 22 students, and the comments received were quite favorable, Shannon said.

One of the questions Shannon asked students was whether they would be in favor of a fee increase if it were needed to ensure continued quality of facilities at Lafene. Not one of the 22 respondents said they would object to an increase, he said.

Tout said that such an increase might be likely in about a year.

"We asked the question just to get a feel for what the students thought about a fee hike," he said. "You don't know what they might feel like when actually confronted with fee increases, but we may have to increase fees in 1985."

Tout said he hopes students let him know if they have a concern or question regarding Lafene, whether or not they have used the facility.

"We advertise in the Collegian at the start of each semester, and we have a health educator who makes visitations, and yet there are some who don't know about our services," Tout said.

"Right now, we are only in the beginning stages, and a lot of planning and discussion will have to be done. A lot will depend on building space, renovations, budgets, parking and much more," Penner said.

"Currently our mission is to come up with a tentative plan which our committee will present to the administration. Our target date is June 1, and it is too early to say when a merger could take effect. That is too far in the future," she said.

The 15-member committee is comprised of representatives from the Riley County Extension Office, Kansas extension specialists at the state and local levels, the Kansas Extension Homemakers Council, the K-State Home Economics Alumni Association and department heads and faculty from the College of Home Economics and the College of Agriculture, said Fred Sobering, director of extension administration.

"Because we are a land-grant university, we are concerned with teaching, research and extension which can be better accomplished when closer working relationships are developed," Sobering said.

Reagan

and Gromyko are scheduled to meet privately Wednesday for the first time since September.

Absent from the speech was the harsh language that marked most of Reagan's previous major speeches on U.S.-Soviet relations. Nor were there any major initiatives. Presidential spokesman Larry Speakes had said the address should be regarded more for its tone than policy statements.

"The fact that neither of us likes the other's system is no reason to refuse to talk," the president said. "Living in this nuclear age makes it imperative that we do talk. Our commitment to dialogue is firm and unshakable. But we insist that our negotiations deal with real problems, not atmospherics."

Reagan introduced an imaginary anecdote about a Soviet couple and an American couple, Ivan and Anya and Jim and Sally, and suggested what they would talk about if they met in a waiting room or shared a rain shelter. Rather than debating the differences of their governments, he said, they would talk about "ambitions, hobbies, what they wanted for their children and the problems of making ends meet."

The point, Reagan said, was that "they would have proven that people don't make wars." And he stated, "If the Soviet government wants peace, then there will be peace."

He reiterated his willingness to resume negotiations with the Soviet Union to reduce medium-range and short-range nuclear missiles, talks that have broken off in Geneva, Switzerland. He said that "whenever the Soviet Union is ready to do likewise, we will meet them halfway."

The president said the nation's "strength and vision of progress" demonstrate both its commitment to security and to solving problems peacefully.

"That is why 1984 is a year of opportunities for peace," he said. But even before he spoke, the Soviet Union said Reagan was making "pseudo-peaceable tirades" to cover up his "bellicose" policies. It indicated his more conciliatory tone would not be matched by the Kremlin.

The pessimistic tone of the commentary by the semi-official news agency Novosti was matched by a detailed editorial in the Communist Party daily Pravda that reviewed the stalled U.S.-Soviet nuclear arms talks and suggested there was little point in resuming them at present.

Novosti dismissed the address as a public relations exercise designed to quell domestic and European fears that the president is a warmonger.

Speakes said, "The president has made a serious speech and we would hope to have a serious response."

Rep. Melvin Price, D-Ill., chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, said he thought the speech was "great" and that it "touched on the major things people are thinking about." He added, "I don't think you could say there was anything new in it."

Tragedies increase in spring

Study finds suicide patterns

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A study of suicides shows that people are most likely to take their own lives on Mondays, on the fifth day of the month and in the springtime.

Just why these patterns occur is a mystery, though experts suspect they reflect particularly stressful times for people who are depressed.

The latest study, conducted by Kathleen MacMahon at the Harvard School of Public Health, is based on an analysis of 185,887 suicides in the United States from 1972 through 1978. It confirms two trends that other researchers have also noticed: Monday is the most common day for suicides, and Saturday is the least. And people are most apt to kill themselves in May and least suicide-prone in December.

However, another finding of the study is new. According to the report, published in the American Journal of Epidemiology, the statistics "reveal a remarkable cyclic variation by day within month which has not previously been recognized."

Suicides reach a peak at about the fifth day of each month, when there are 6 percent more of them than usual. Then they decline to about the 23rd, when they start to go back up again. Throughout the whole year, the only major exception to this pattern is February, when suicides peak during the middle of the month.

However, none of this seems to be related to the phases of the moon, which some people think affect behavior.

"No ready explanation comes to mind for this as for the other cycles," MacMahon wrote. "Possibly it is related to cycles in personal finances during the month — arrival of bills or pay checks, for example."

During April, she noted, the suicide surge arrives a bit later than usual and peaks in the week before federal income tax returns are due.

At the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, sociologist James Mercy said the outburst of suicides at the start of the work week has promoted some people to call this day "blue Monday."

Although it is not clear why people choose this day to kill themselves, he said, some theorize that "people are going back to work, and those who are isolated or left out feel an exaggerated sense of depression at that period."

These suicide trends are more than statistical curiosities, Mercy said.

"If we know that suicides occur at a higher rate at one point in time," he said, "we can alter interventions to take that into account."

It might help, for instance, to advertise suicide hotlines on Sunday evenings or in the springtime.

The study of suicide is a craft that thrives on statistics. For instance, various reports have shown:

— Suicide is the way that approximately one in every six people with major depression eventually dies.

— Suicide is the third leading cause of death among Americans in their late teens and early 20s.

— Women make two to three times as many suicide attempts as men, but men are more likely to be successful at it.

— The suicide rate for female physicians is four times higher than for women in other walks of life.

— The highest suicide rate in this century occurred in 1932, during the depths of the Great Depression.

— During the 1970s, there were 73 suicides a day.

A federal study published last year in the New England Journal of Medicine said the use of firearms to commit suicide has increased dramatically over a 25-year period — from 4.9 deaths per 100,000 in 1953 to 7.1 per 100,000 in 1978.

The study said the rate of suicide by firearms has climbed twice as rapidly as the rate by gas or poison — two other common means of death. And it said other research has shown that handguns account for 83 percent of all firearms used in suicide.

Salvador

El Salvador if progress on human rights was inadequate. He suggested such a link was incompatible with his commitment to prevent victory by "Cuban and Nicaraguan-supported guerrillas."

Soon U.S. officials said, the administration is expected to ask Congress for approval of supplemental military aid for El Salvador in excess of $140 million. The current aid level is $64.8 million.

Administration critics have focused on the activities of rightist death squads, which have executed professors, labor leaders and other suspected "subversives."

The report said Salvadoran officials are speaking out against death squads, and "some unprecedented initial actions" have been taken to bring them under control. It said "several officers with alleged ties to death squads" were transferred to other posts in November, and three members of the Constituent Assembly security force were arrested in December on kidnapping charges.

Study of zoning laws good idea

The city of Manhattan is taking a step in the right direction by conducting a study of zoning laws affecting neighborhoods south and east of the K-State campus. Leaders must be careful, however, that the plan to be developed from the study doesn't create more mistakes than have already been made.

Zoning laws are always difficult to enforce. Manhattan's problem arose when the University grew faster than the city's housing facilities.

As enrollment began its meteoric rise in the 1960s to its current level, property owners seized the opportunity for profit by building apartments in homes zoned for single- or double-family occupancy. And who can blame them? Students have to live somewhere, and many Manhattanites were and are there when needed to provide this vital necessity.

The problems created by this somewhat makeshift construction are at the root of the city's effort to beef up zoning enforcement. Some residents living near campus have complained that the lax enforcement has led to monumental parking and noise problems.

While the citizens facing these problems are to be pitied, they must also realize the economic importance of those students whose cars are parked on their streets. City officials also need to realize the needs of the University when making decisions regarding zoning.

Strict zoning laws are effective only if they are vigorously enforced. It is clear that the city has in the past chosen to live and let live in this area. That action may not be right, but the precedent has been set, and only now is anyone taking the initiative to do something about it.

The city should protect "real" Manhattan residents from the perils of overcrowding while making sure there is still room in the inn for the students upon whom the local economy depends.

All wrinkles in current zoning ordinances should be ironed out, a method of enforcement established and a clear understanding of the laws presented to the people. Then, the city should set a date in the not-too-distant future when the laws would take effect.

This process, commonly referred to as "grandfathering," is the only fair way to clean up the zoning mess. Although this wouldn't provide a quick fix for today's complainers, it would be a long-term solution to an age-old conflict.

All men may not favor pro-life attitude...

Editor,

Re: Kecia Stolfus' column, "A pro-choice response: uncovering contradictory right-to-life attitudes," in the Jan. 13 Collegian:

By interjecting sexist remarks throughout the column, Stolfus has muddled the issue of abortion. We do concede that this is a sex-oriented issue, however, remarks such as "I question whether Gillispie and the pro-lifers would argue so adamantly for a female fetus" are unnecessary. Why does she equate a male-dominated society with a pro-life attitude, implying that men somehow desire to "usurp women's rights" by making them "suffer" a pregnancy? This merely clouds the issue; all men are not pro-lifers.

Stolfus' framework of "worth to society" includes "intelligence, creativity, intuition, strength, ideas and thoughts." Admittedly, a fetus probably doesn't possess many of these qualities and never will if aborted. However, Stolfus speaks adamantly about a woman's potential for "worth" after an abortion, but seems to have no consideration for the potential of an unborn child to develop productive qualities.

Abortion is not only an issue of human rights, but also an issue of human responsibility. Yes, "it takes two to tango," but do we not understand the results of tangoing? The majority of abortions, excluding rape victims, propounds a very selfish attitude on the part of both individuals involved. Why do we feel so privileged that we no longer have to take responsibility for our actions? It seems that abortion is only one example of this larger problem.

We won't refute her statistics about child education, poverty, malnutrition, unemployment and the "ill-cared for" — they are impressive. While pro-lifers need to support unwed mothers, it is unfair to saddle the pro-lifers with all these post-birth problems. There are other factors involved. Maybe Stolfus would agree with Jonathan Swift's idea of solving England's problems as in "A Modest Proposal." These problems will not be solved by aborting our children.

Lecture choices commendable

The Landon Lecture series officials should be commended for the selection of speakers scheduled this semester.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., will speak Jan. 30. Although he was hospitalized earlier this month, Kennedy, a 1980 presidential candidate, has not cancelled plans to speak at K-State.

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley has been scheduled to speak Feb. 3. Hodding Carter III, will visit Feb. 13. Carter was a State Department spokesman during Jimmy Carter's administration.

After an uneventful fall 1983 semester when no Landon lectures were presented, the plans for three prominent political officials to speak this spring encourage the prospect of an interesting and mind-expanding semester.

University communities, centers of higher education and the development of ideas and concepts, often institute lecture series to attract society's leaders to their campuses to speak. Besides offering the usual learning associated with classes and homework, a college education should also include the chance to see, hear and possibly meet prominent people. Here at K-State, through the Landon Lecture series, politicians, journalists, presidents, activists, prime ministers and foreign ministers have spoken and helped to educate us about world issues.

William Richter, series chairman and professor of political science, should especially be complimented for his part in securing such well-known people to appear at K-State, for he plays an important role in ensuring valuable educational opportunities. This sends a clear message to other state universities that K-State's "silo-tech" image does not adequately describe the University and the studies it offers. As can be attested to by previous speakers, K-State's true reputation includes progressive thought and education.

Because 1984 is a presidential election year, Kennedy might be expected to offer his views and insights into the crowded Democratic race, which he chose not to join this year after an attempt in 1980. Because of the recent 20-year anniversary of the assassination of former President John F. Kennedy, he could also offer reflections of his brother's days in office.

Carter, now working for the Public Broadcasting System, could be expected to reflect on either the Carter administration or his transition from State Department spokesman to television personality.

Bradley, one of the first black big-city mayors, will most likely comment on black politicians and the Rev. Jesse Jackson's effects on the Democratic presidential race.

Race: the 'great unmentionable'

WASHINGTON — The caller said we had met once at a party and there was something he wanted to discuss. He had been reading everything there was to read about Lt. Robert O. Goodman Jr., the navy flier, and he had seen all there was to see about him on television. What he wanted to know was this: How come no one mentioned that his wife is white?

Now the truth is that I had been wondering about that myself. But when the caller broached the subject, my inclination was to shout, "So what!" and slam the phone down on him as an obvious bigot. I'm glad I did not. The caller turned out to be black. And his wife is white.

So we talked. I explained to him that most newspapers adhere to the germaneness rule. And since it is not really germane — merely interesting — that Terry Lynn Goodman is white, it mostly went unmentioned. We are now at some midpoint, past where race gets mentioned in some pejorative or definitive sense — as if it is all you need to know about a person — and not quite to where it can be mentioned at all.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that Terry Lynn Goodman became the Invisible Woman of the entire Goodman episode. Both among blacks and whites, her race was a topic of conversation. After all, interracial marriages are hardly commonplace. For whites, they go to the core of race prejudice, miscegenation and all of that. It was not too long ago, after all, that a black man could be lynched for merely winking is illustrative of the way the whole issue of race was treated when it came to the Goodman saga. Although some mentioned race as a way of criticizing Jesse Jackson (would he have done the same for a white?), few paused to celebrate the occasion for the same reason.

To start with Goodman himself, he is a second generation military officer — until recently, an unheard of phenomenon for blacks. Not only that, but he is an officer in the Navy, the branch of the service that traditionally was the most hostile to blacks.

But Goodman is only one-half of the story. The other is, of course, Jackson. Here is something new under the sun — a meaningful black presidential candidate. Until the Voting Rights Act, Jackson would have been a mere curiosity. Blacks were largely unregistered, few could vote, and no black candidate could have had any chance of either gaining the nomination or, at the least, influencing the convention.

The point is that race was a theme in the entire Goodman episode, and the failure to acknowledge the obvious was an epic exercise in historic amnesia. But when it came to Mrs. Goodman, the failure was more personal. Ignoring her race once she herself chose to surface tended to deprive her of her individuality.

The Goodman episode proves two things: When it comes to race, we have come a long way. And when it comes to race, we still have a long way to go.

Questions about coliseum distort issue

Editor,

Re: Robert Dubois' guest column, "Funding coliseum raises question of priorities," in the Jan. 13 Collegian:

While I agree with the general point of Dubois' column, I must point out two issues which he distorted by failing to ask the right questions.

Dubois talked about a good athletic program attracting students to the University. Instead of asking students to raise the question, "Did K-State's athletics play a significant role in my choosing to attend this University?" I believe the following question would have been more appropriate: "Did the publicity from K-State's athletic program make this University an option in my selection of a university?"

Dubois also asked, "When was the last time the Union Program Council sold out a major concert at K-State?" I believe an effective counterargument to that is the fact that groups which could attract a sell-out crowd don't want to come to perform here because of poor facilities.

Fans need sportsmanship

Editor,

Re: "Plain and simple, he's one dedicated fan!" in the Jan. 16 Collegian:

I agree with Robert Lipson — fan support is needed in attendance as well as enthusiasm! I also appreciate his help with recruitment, but Lipson and I disagree on a few of his points.

Is Lipson too good for the rest of us? He asks us to go nuts for an hour and a half, but it takes a Wildcat miracle (a slam dunk) for him to get enough energy to wave his pennant. I'm also wondering if Lipson couldn't turn some of his loyalty into action by leading us in a few cheers. And, as for constructive cheering, I think the recruits who are present at the game would be a bit more impressed by a crowd that, satisfied with doing their part, would leave Ahearn with smiles on their faces instead of stampeding across one of the nicest courts in the Big Eight.

Let's rock Ahearn and the Sooners with our cheering in a sportsmanlike manner.

Capital celebrates King's birthday

TOPEKA — While about 250 people sang "We Shall Overcome," Gov. John Carlin joined with state and local leaders Monday to celebrate the 55th birthday anniversary of the late Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

Carlin called King "the great equalizer, who brought equality to our system that is fair and appropriate for all."

"This is an appropriate opportunity to celebrate the contributions Martin Luther King made to our society."

Carlin reminded those attending the celebration, which was held on the second floor rotunda of the Capitol, that Kansas would observe King's Jan. 15 birthdate as a state holiday beginning in 1985. King's birthdate has been declared a national holiday beginning in 1986.

To commemorate King, Carlin has arranged for an Austrian Pine tree to be planted on the Capitol grounds in late March or early April.

'That Girl' finds peace in marriage

NEW YORK — Actress Marlo Thomas says of her marriage to television personality Phil Donahue that "being understood makes one very peaceful."

Thomas, 40, and Donahue, 49, a divorced father of four, married in 1980, she for the first time.

She said in an interview in the current McCall's magazine that before she could marry she had to learn that "marriage wasn't something that happened to you, but something two people could design themselves."

She and her husband loved and trusted each other enough "to make our relationship a wide positive space that was generous and roomy enough to hold everything we wanted."

"Feeling the future with someone — there is an indefinable amount of eternal time that this person and I will be together — the way I feel about my parents — I never felt that way with a man before, that he was, in fact, a total part of my life that would always be there," she said.

NBC wants Mudd as reporter

LOS ANGELES — NBC-TV board chairman Grant Tinker says he hopes former NBC news anchorman Roger Mudd will stay with the network as senior political correspondent, but can't say definitely if he will.

"I can't guarantee that, only Roger can, but I certainly hope so," Tinker told reporters this past weekend at the network's mid-season press gathering.

Tinker said he had no knowledge of a reported possible settlement that would allow Mudd to leave NBC and work elsewhere. "I hope it's not true," he said.

NBC removed Mudd last September from the anchor slot he shared with Tom Brokaw on "NBC Nightly News." Mudd had joined the network after being passed over for the anchor job on the "CBS Evening News" that went to Dan Rather.

Commission to scrutinize mall project

Amendments to the Downtown Redevelopment Plan will head items on the agenda of the Manhattan City Commission tonight.

The amendments will include all the changes that have taken place in the project during the last two years, such as location of office buildings and size of the proposed mall.

Other agenda items concerning the project include the consideration of contracts for appraisal and review appraisal services in conjunction with redevelopment. Authorization for the selection of a relocation consultant and salary for that consultant also are scheduled for discussion.

The commission will consider a request from Riley County Commissioners to vacate a portion of Fifth Street for expansion of the Riley County Court House and a request from the Manhattan Board of Realtors concerning residences that don't conform to zoning laws.

The request involves a study by city planners who are dealing with housing and parking problems primarily east of campus. The proposed text change by the board would have to be referred to the city planning board for a public hearing.

An ordinance which would remove parking meters on Poyntz Avenue will be read a second time to determine whether a plan to establish a two-hour parking limit on that street will be feasible.

The commission will meet at 7 p.m. tonight in the City Commission Room at City Hall, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue.

The high court left intact Monday an Oklahoma appeals court ruling that the Constitution's First Amendment does not shield "news persons from state criminal prosecution on their news-gathering function."

In other matters, the justices:

- Let stand a ruling that allows New York state to prohibit Trans World Airlines from forcing stewardesses to take leave as soon as they become pregnant.
- Refused to free American Telephone & Telegraph Co. from having to pay a $276 million antitrust award to Litton Systems Inc. for "bad faith" competition in the telephone equipment business.
- Killed an effort by five states — Arizona, California, Florida, Oregon and Washington — to recover from 13 oil companies millions of dollars their citizens spent on inflated gasoline and heating oil prices.
- Agreed to decide in a New Mexico case whether police need to obtain a search warrant before secretly installing radio transmitters inside containers to help track down drug traffickers.
- Rebuffed an appeal from organized labor and left intact the Reagan administration's cost-cutting overhaul of a Depression-era law, the Davis-Bacon Act. The act places a floor under wages of workers on federal construction projects.

Supreme Court verdict upholds journalists' trespassing penalties

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday allowed states to prosecute news reporters and photographers who accompany trespassing demonstrators onto private property, such as the site of a proposed nuclear power plant.

The justices, without comment, rejected the appeals of six Oklahoma journalists who had argued that their trespassing convictions and $25 fines violated the constitutional guarantee of a free press.

The journalists were arrested in 1979, along with 339 demonstrators, while on the grounds of the fenced-in Black Fox Station. A nuclear plant may be built on the 2,200-acre tract of land in Rogers County, Okla.

The high court left intact Monday an Oklahoma appeals court ruling that the Constitution's First Amendment does not shield "news persons from state criminal prosecution on their news-gathering function."

In other matters, the justices:

—Agreed to resolve in a case from Pennsylvania a multimillion-dollar dispute over how the federal government protects its employees in states with no-fault auto insurance.

In the Oklahoma case, the court was told by the journalists' lawyers that the public utility companies that own the Black Fox Station land near Tulsa are seeking, "in concert with local law enforcement authorities," to "manipulate the flow of information to the public."

But the state appeals court that upheld the journalists' convictions said, "The First Amendment (which ensures freedom of the press) does not guarantee the press a constitutional right of special access not available to the public generally."

The journalists arrested while covering the demonstration represented KOCO-TV in Oklahoma City; the Grove Sun of Grove, Okla.; the Oklahoma Publishing Co. newspapers in Oklahoma City; and the Oklahoma (University) Daily.

As the Wildcats' tallest player at 6 feet 9 inches, Eddie Elder is filling the center position vacated by the graduation of Les Craft and transfer of Neil Degner. He is ranked fourth in the Big Eight in field goal percentage with a .610 average.

Elder muscles up to fill center spot

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

With last year's graduation of 6-foot-10-inch center Les Craft and the transfer of 6-foot-9-inch center Neil Degner, the K-State men's basketball team has been operating without a true post man thus far in the 1983-84 campaign.

But the tallest player on this year's Wildcat squad, 6-foot-9-inch forward Eddie Elder, along with sophomore Alex Williams, has helped to fill the gap that is open at the center position.

Because Elder has participated in K-State's weight training program, his increased strength and weight has enabled him to play well against taller players in K-State's non-conference action this year. On Dec. 21, Elder battled against 7-foot-2-inch Uwe Blab from Indiana University to grab a game-high 12 rebounds.

Elder has been K-State's top rebounder in eight of the first 13 games, with his season high of 13 rebounds coming against Southern Colorado last Saturday night.

"The program has helped me physically, which is obvious," Elder said. "I've gained strength as well as weight."

In the basketball off-season — during the late spring and in the fall — the men's basketball team concentrates on the weight training program. The program consists of working out three days a week in the weight room under the direction of Russ Riederer, K-State's weight coach.

"It (the weight training program) also builds you up for a game as far as confidence is concerned," Elder said.

Against the University of Nevada-Las Vegas, Elder recorded a career high 19 points. On four other occasions Elder was again high scorer for the 'Cats.

Although Elder started playing basketball in junior high school, and it has been an important part in his life so far, he is also serious about his education.

"I came to K-State because of tradition," Elder said, referring to Coach Jack Hartman and the education offered at K-State.

Elder is a junior majoring in finance and currently has a 3.121 grade point average. He has also earned academic all-Big Eight honors and was a College of Sports Information Directors Association District Five academic honoree.

In balancing sports with studying, he said the most important thing is being able to budget his time.

Elder said that basketball has provided him with a lot of discipline.

"Playing during the basketball season keeps me in the routine of going to class, to practice and then making time for studies in the evening," Elder said. "When I'm not playing and not as busy, it's harder to get motivated to study."

Elder's basketball goals for this year include "having K-State be in contention for the Big Eight championship and working for the post-season play-offs."

Big Eight action for the Wildcats begins Wednesday night when the 'Cats travel to Stillwater to play Oklahoma State University.

Enthusiastic crowd support important

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

Maybe ticket sales are down and maybe the football team didn't improve its previous record. But while these clouds float around in the minds of many people, nobody seems to question the role and responsibility which is placed on a supporting crowd at any sports event.

It is this tradition of support that made Bobby Knight, head basketball coach at Indiana University, once comment that Ahearn was one of the most difficult places to play in because of the mass support coming from the stands.

Marion Latimore, an assistant football coach, said he knows the importance of a large supporting crowd.

"Fan support is very important," Latimore said. "Players love an enthusiastic crowd behind them. It's extremely important to a kid to let him know he's important, he's welcome."

Latimore said the crowd has a lot to do with a team's performance on the field. Seeing the stadium with attendance figures of 13,000 or 36,000, he said he can easily tell the difference of a team's reaction to its level of support. He said it would help the football team tremendously if the stadium were filled at each game.

In some cases, mass support is lacking. Jim Medina, junior in management and member of the varsity tennis team, said he and his fellow team members have had to learn to do without the luxury of a large supporting crowd.

"If they came and watched," Medina said "it would make me feel like it (the game) was more important and make me feel like what we do is worth a little.

"As far as basketball and football, a crowd is priceless," he said.

Mike Sutcliffe, a former K-State student, said he thinks being a fan runs deep.

Sutcliffe said he remembers the days of long waiting lines for tickets and the camping out. He said he thinks the fans are reacting like a team in the cellar and that student enthusiasm needs to increase sharply.

Two 'Skins win awards

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Super Bowl participants Joe Theismann and Dave Butz of the Washington Redskins and Todd Christensen of the Los Angeles Raiders were among the 11 Players of the Year announced Monday by the National Football League Alumni Association.

Theismann passed for 29 touchdowns and threw only 11 interceptions during the 1983 season when he led the Redskins, to a 14-2 record, the best in the league. He was named the Quarterback of the Year and Butz was named Defensive Lineman of the Year.

Christensen led the NFL in receiving with 92 catches, the most ever by a tight end.

Three members of the Pittsburgh Steelers also were selected — center Mike Webster as the Offensive Lineman of the Year, Jack Lambert as the top linebacker and Gary Anderson as the best kicker.

Other Players of the Year are running back Eric Dickerson of the Los Angeles Rams, wide receiver Roy Green of the St. Louis Cardinals, defensive back Ronnie Lott of the San Francisco 49ers, kick-returner Billy Johnson of the Atlanta Falcons and special teams star Bill Bates of the Dallas Cowboys.

Big Eight basketball title in the clouds

Before the start of this season, the Big Eight Conference was seen as a clouded mass — no basketball team stood out as the clear favorite.

And despite the fact that 109 games involving Big Eight teams have been played so far this season, the conference race still remains unclear.

Basketball forecasters have tabbed the University of Kansas Jayhawks as the preseason conference favorites despite the fact that the 'Hawks posted a less-than-reputable 13-16 mark the previous year. However, KU has failed to live up to expectations so far this season, having barely squeezed by Colorado in its Big Eight opener.

New coach Larry Brown has come to Lawrence from the pro ranks (New Jersey Nets) and found his players unsuited for his pro-style game. Greg Dreiling, the 'Hawks 7-foot-11-inch transfer, has adapted to the KU program painfully slow. The loss of forward Kerry Boagni, who transferred to Cal State-Fullerton, and point guard Cedric Hunter, who has been declared academically ineligible for the spring semester, has left a big hole in the Jayhawks' starting lineup, forcing Brown to go with tiny 5-foot-10-inch Mark Turgeon at the point guard spot. Forward Brian Martin has played well thus far his senior year, but KU's front-court still hasn't caught fire.

With KU's problems, the 17th-ranked Wayman University, uh, the University of Oklahoma Sooners have emerged as the conference favorite.

The Great Wayman Tisdale has had no problem with the so-called "sophomore jinx," as he is well on his way to earning All-America status again. The 6-foot-9-inch center is currently averaging a nation-leading 29.3 points a game as a dominating inside force for the Sooners.

However, OU has turned out not to be just a one-man team. Freshman sensation Tim McCalister has shown no fear of putting the ball up and is hitting 18 points a contest. McCalister's outside bombs have freed up Tisdale and the rest of the OU frontcourt, including Calvin Pierce, who earlier this season had the Dunk of the Year (so far) against Syracuse on national television.

Four-time defending league champion Missouri should be the Sooners' main challenger for the conference crown.

The Tigers lost all-Big Eight performers Jon Sunvold and Steve Stipanovich to graduation, but MU has clawed its way to an 11-3 record. The Tigers have been led by junior college transfer Malcolm Thomas. The 6-foot-7-inch forward is averaging 18.6 points a contest. Thomas joins 6-foot-10-inch center Greg Cavener, averaging 13 points a game, to give the Tigers a strong frontcourt. And with 6-1 jumping-jack Prince Bridges and 6-4 senior guard Ron Jones, the Tigers have a solid nucleus.

TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Nebraska also looks to challenge for the Big Eight title. The Cornhuskers, led by 6-foot-11-inch center Dave Hoppen, have jumped out to a 10-3 mark. Hoppen, an all-Big Eight choice last year as a freshman, is averaging 19 points a game for the 'Huskers, making him one of the dominating players in the conference.

Six-foot-4-inch senior Stan Cloudy also is having a good year at the forward spot with a 14 point average, while senior David Ponce returns at the point guard spot to give Nebraska quickness in the backcourt.

The Cyclones are on a roll with wins over OU and state rival Iowa in their last two games. The Cyclones are led by 6-foot-7-inch forward Barry Stevens, who is second to Tisdale in Big Eight scoring with a 25.4 points per game average. With a 11-3 record, Iowa State may be a force to be reckoned with in the Big Eight this year.

Following KU, the Colorado Buffaloes, Oklahoma State Cowboys, and K-State Wildcats should fight it out to avoid the conference cellar.

The Buffaloes have been a bit of a surprise with their record of 9-5 for the year. Colorado has three players scoring in double figures, led by guard Jay Humphries, who is pumping in 17.6 points per game. With a 15-point average, center Randy Downs also is in double figures while forward Alex Stivrins, with a 12-point scoring norm, has been a welcome addition to the squad after transferring from Creighton.

Oklahoma State is another team that lost two all-conference performers in center Leroy Combs and guard Matt Clark, but the Cowboys haven't bounced back as well as Missouri has this season.

The Cowboys have two of the conference's top six scorers in the forward tandem of Joe Atkinson and Raymond Crenshaw. After sitting out most of the 1983 season because of a broken hand, the 6-foot-7-inch junior Atkinson has come back strong, averaging just over 19 points a game. Crenshaw, a 6-foot-7-inch senior, is averaging 18 points per contest for the Cowboys. Despite the play of Atkinson and Crenshaw, the team has struggled somewhat to an 8-5 record.

That leaves us with the 'Cats. K-State has shown flashes of promise, with narrow road losses to Indiana and Nevada-Las Vegas. Since the Christmas break, the 'Cats haven't been the same, losing to Northern Iowa and struggling to beat Eastern Washington and Southern Colorado.

K-State, with its 8-5 record, may have trouble avoiding the schools' first back-to-back losing campaigns since the '44-45 and '45-46 seasons.

Overall, the conference race looks to be a tight one, with Oklahoma, Missouri and Nebraska leading the race and Iowa State being the dark horse.

Burrowing Marines find safety underground in 'Mole City'

By The Associated Press
BEIRUT, Lebanon — Staff Sgt. Edward Peerenboom fired up a gas-fueled camping lantern and gestured toward a narrow dirt passage that leads underground. "Welcome to 'Mole City,'" he said. Carrying the lantern at shoulder level, the 27-year-old sergeant from Milwaukee, led the way through a labyrinth of tunnels that connect 21 sandbagged bunkers along one perimeter position of the U.S. Marine base in Beirut. The sparkler-white lantern light illuminated a full kitchen underground and a series of "bedrooms" with Marine-issue cots, home for several dozen men. At various turns in the passageway, the darkness was broken by ceiling-level "windows" used as gunports for the platoon's machine guns, grenade launchers and shoulder-held automatic rifles. Eight dirt ramps serve as emergency exits. The third platoon of the Golf Company line unit has dug in to the point where its members need surface only to get water, go to the latrine or take a shower. "We had a lot of incentive to do this," Peerenboom said. "When we first got here, we were taking mortar and rocket fire almost every night." Most of the Marines stationed at Beirut International Airport live in underground bunkers, but no other unit, including the peacekeeping forces of other nations, has developed the elaborate connecting tunnels that Peerenboom's platoon has. "It's a hard-charging platoon that takes a lot of pride in what it does," said the battalion commander, Lt. Col. Ray Smith, 38, of Jacksonville, N.C. "They took the initiative, and they put a lot of back-breaking work into it. They should be proud."

The Marines, who as recently as last summer often lived in tents or in bunkers above ground, have been digging in for better protection against repeated attacks on their post. Some of the newer bunkers are actually submerged metal boxes, about the size of a small truck trailer, reinforced with sandbags to sustain the impact of a direct hit. Many have plastic sheets or tarp paper strips interwoven with rooftop sandbags to keep out torrential winter rains. Some even have electricity. The Golf Company labyrinth is entirely handmade, and Peerenboom figures his men have filled nearly 500,000 sandbags to do it. "We'd dig the trenches during the daylight hours, then fill sandbags until midnight," recalled Cpl. Garrett Tatum, 22, of Charlotte, N.C., of the first weeks after the unit arrived as a relief force in mid-November. "It wasn't fun, but we all knew it was for our own protection, so we kept at it."

The sandbags — burlap casings measuring about 2 feet by 1 foot by 6 inches when full of dirt — are piled 15 high. Steel poles or pieces of wood reinforce the walls and brace ceilings made of steel plates or 5-inch diameter pipe. Sandbags and dirt "camouflage" help the roof line blend in with the dusty terrain. Although they are still digging "additions," the Marines of Mole City figure they've got the basics in place for as comfortable a life as one could expect in the field. Lance Cpl. Kenneth Gainey, the platoon cook, can prepare a hot meal for his unit even when the Marines are on alert and required to stay in their bunkers. "Don't matter to me what's going on outside," said Gainey, 21, of Dunn, N.C. That night on his diesel-fired stove he was planning "to whip up something simple: beef in barbecue sauce, scalloped potatoes and a fresh tomato and cucumber salad." Down the corridor, Sgt. Russell Jackson, 24, of Mission, S.D., sat at the plywood desk in his "hootch" carefully numbering Polaroid pictures of the Marine base to send home to his wife, Nancy. Three white candles and a camping lantern illuminated his work. The largest of the sleeping bays holds up to four men, and at times double as card rooms. Some smaller rooms were designed for work — the communications center is packed with Marine radios, and the machine gun positions have tar paper walls to eliminate silhouettes during night fire-fights. The underground home is not, however, without its drawbacks. "I've gotten as many as 20 or 21 mice in a single trap in four days," said Lance Cpl. Duke Walker, 21, of Little Rock, Ark. "Peanut butter's the best bait." Two lance corporals taking a break from filling sandbags — Jesse Duarte, 19, of Los Angeles and Jay Savage, 20, of Atlanta — said they like their underground quarters. "It creates more of a family atmosphere," Savage said. "Everybody can be together." "And it's much safer than before," Duarte added. "But of course, you can't ever feel really safe around here anywhere."

Reagan gains approval of women legislators

By The Associated Press
TOPEKA — The Reagan administration is making great strides in advancing women's causes and improving their treatment in professional fields, according to eight Republican women members of the Kansas Legislature who attended a luncheon and briefing last week at the White House. The GOP legislators were briefed on a variety of issues from President Reagan, Vice President George Bush and several cabinet officers. All eight women told a news conference Monday they were impressed with the information provided by Reagan staffers regarding women's issues. They were happy to be invited and play along with Reagan's publicity gimmick of inviting Republican women lawmakers from state legislatures all across the country to the luncheon. They said they did not feel patronized by the action.

"Certainly that point was brought up," said Sen. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park. "But there are many occasions, I'm sure, when the state dining room is filled with all men and no one asks whether they feel patronized or used in any way. I think they are showing a sensitivity to the fact they have concerns about the perception of how they treat women. They are being sensitive on several issues of great importance to women and are just trying to stress the positive things they have done for women." Meyers said she was impressed by the administration's actions in the area of appointments, noting Reagan has named a woman to the Supreme Court of the United States along with three women cabinet officers. She also pointed out his "new initiatives in child support enforcement and pension reform."

"The move to enforce the payment of child support to women is extremely important because that is about a $4 billion item," Meyers said. She said Reagan's attempts to improve the economy will have a direct effect on working women because she said they traditionally make lower wages and therefore "are particularly vulnerable to the

Geese may clue researchers to causes of strokes in man

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

Studies of geese by a K-State research team may provide information which could help reduce the incidence of stroke in humans.

Roger Fedde, professor of anatomy and physiology, and Frank Faraci, graduate in anatomy and physiology, are conducting their experiments on Bar-headed geese, birds that migrate over the Himalayas.

When a human suffers a stroke caused by a disturbance in the blood supply to the brain, paralysis often results. This paralysis stems from a lack of oxygen to the brain cells, a term called hypoxia. Currently, the mechanisms involved in control of brain blood flow in man and other mammals is poorly understood.

But studies of the geese may someday lead to ways in which blood flow can be controlled. These geese have the ability to survive at high elevations where there is little oxygen.

Studying why these birds can tolerate a lack of oxygen better than mammals or many other birds may lead to important answers involving the control of blood flow to the brain and other body organs.

"Our interest lies in the fact that if the Bar-headed goose has the capability of not only surviving at high altitude, but even exercising vigorously at these altitudes, they may have a different mechanism for controlling brain blood flow," Fedde said.

The key to the experiment is to understand the mechanisms that control the blood flow to the brain and then determine how to modify them, he said.

That the birds can have blood flow twice as high as mammals has been confirmed in Faraci's research.

Faraci has been investigating the changes in organ blood flow that occur when there is a lack of oxygen. To measure the blood flow to the brain and heart in resting birds (future steps will include running and flying birds), the radioactive microsphere technique is used.

"A tube is placed in the left ventricle (in the heart) via the right brachial artery," Faraci said.

Provost reiterates Mahaffey charges

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

The charge of professional incompetence, for which the University recommended dismissing tenured professor Ben Mahaffey, "best included the conditions which we were most concerned about," Provost Owen Koeppel testified Monday in Mahaffey's appeal hearing of the dismissal.

The three conditions named as examples of professional incompetence were presented in a letter to Mahaffey and signed by four University administrators. The conditions were derived collectively, Koeppel said, but two of the four signees — Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry, and John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture — had the most input into the action. The other two were Koeppel and David Mugler, assistant dean of instruction in the College of Agriculture.

Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, was suspended from University duties and recommended for dismissal Sept. 1. Specific charges cited as his professional incompetence include "a history of student complaints of intimidation, unfair grading practices and a sexist attitude," "creation of a classroom environment that reduced interest in course offerings and departmental programs" and "unproductive and uncooperative relationships with forestry department personnel and administrators."

When asked by David Schauer, Mahaffey's attorney, if any of the three charges alone would have been enough for dismissal, Koeppel replied no.

"My feeling was it was not a question that you had to have all or none of these (for professional incompetence)," he said.

Several abilities are needed to show professional competence in education, Koeppel said, including knowledge of information, the ability to present that information in the classroom and the ability to work with colleagues and students.

"We felt we had reasons," Koeppel said about the actions taken against Mahaffey. The move to immediately suspend Mahaffey from University duties in September was to protect the department and students from further harm, he said.

In his opening statement for the University, Richard Seaton, University attorney, said conflicts involving Mahaffey began soon after Mahaffey joined the University in 1972 as an assistant professor of horticulture and forestry. In July 1977 a separate forestry department was formed with Harold Gallaher as department head, and Mahaffey moved into the department.

"Problems literally began immediately," between Mahaffey and other department faculty members, Seaton said.

In the fall of 1978 a number of complaints about student intimidation were made against Mahaffey. Seaton contended Gallaher gave Mahaffey a "form of notice" by meeting with him to resolve the matters.

Mahaffey's reaction to the meeting, Seaton said, was that he felt he was being intimidated himself and threatened to file a lawsuit. In February 1979 a department review suggested Mahaffey improve his relationship with other department faculty members. Mahaffey's reaction then, Seaton said, was walking out of the review meeting.

In 1979, Seaton continued, Mahaffey was again given a poor evaluation from Thomas Warner, associate professor of forestry and Mahaffey's program leader. Seaton said Mahaffey told Warner, "If you'll give me an average score and an average raise I won't name you in a lawsuit."

Mahaffey has, over the years, filed three grievances with the Faculty Senate Grievance Board and a civil suit naming President Duane Acker, Koeppel, Warner and seven other administrators as defendants.

Koeppel, who was on the witness stand for more than three hours, said consideration to dismiss Mahaffey first emerged in July 1981 after the second grievance committee issued its report. In a letter to Gallaher, Koeppel warned that if departmental relationships did not improve, "other means would have to be taken."

Although two chances to find another "University home" for Mahaffey developed during the years of conflict in the forestry department, neither one was given much consideration by the provost.

Redevelopment may spur tax hike, referendum

By WAYNE PRICE
Staff Writer

A possible tax increase resulting from Manhattan's downtown redevelopment project and state law may force a special referendum on the matter.

City Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood, an opponent of some downtown redevelopment projects, made the proposal for a referendum during discussion of an amendment to the ordinance creating the redevelopment district. The ordinance was one of several major items on the commission's agenda when it met Tuesday night.

The statement was met with silence from City Attorney Bill Frost and an admonishment from Mayor Wanda Fateley that tax increases cannot be determined until the city has adopted a new budget.

Reading from the downtown redevelopment plan, Lindamood said that if all the downtown redevelopment funding becomes available, there will be a need for a 2.7 mill property tax increase, or a 7.8 percent overall tax increase. According to state law, Lindamood said, this would bring about the need for a referendum calling for approval or disapproval of downtown redevelopment.

"The way it states now," Lindamood said,

"if taxes are raised, then a referendum will be held. I think any person in their right mind will come away with the same idea."

Commissioner Dave Fiser said some of the tax increases might come from construction of new drainage and water routing systems. But Fiser was quickly interrupted by Lindamood.

"This is beyond water," Lindamood said. "It states clearly here."

The associate professor of family economics also cited a March 1981 issue of Poyntz of Interest, a newsletter distributed by the city Community Development Department, that indicated no tax increase would be necessary to fund the project.

Community Development Director Gary Stith said the publication was wrong on that point.

Lindamood said she would make sure the item would be put on the agenda for the next commission meeting Jan. 24, where an executive session is scheduled to discuss a report by a consulting firm on city personnel.

Stith also released figures for financing of the project. Total public funding would be $25 million. A $10 million Urban Development Action Grant, which gained preliminary approval in late October, would be included in the public funding along with tax increment and benefit district financing. A private investment of $28 million would be created by the project.

With Lindamood casting the only dissenting vote, the ordinance passed 4-1.

The commission also was split in its decision to close a portion of Fifth Street between Poyntz Avenue and Humboldt Street in order to make way for development of the Riley County Court House Plaza. The plan calls for landscaping and a parking lot on the plaza.

After hearing presentations from county commissioners, it became apparent that area businessmen were split over development of the plaza, which is not only intended to increase the aesthetics of the area but to draw people from the mall through downtown Manhattan to numerous cultural events.

One businessman who said he wasn't in favor of closing the street was Charlie Brown, president of Downtown Manhattan Inc. He said he believes more research must be done on possible future traffic problems created by the mall before closing Fifth.

Henry Otto, an attorney representing Forest Campbell, owner of a gift shop across the street from the court house, said he's afraid the area will become more complex for parking. Otto, who also owns land on Poyntz, said he feared that people who park at the mall will stay there.

"We see Poyntz becoming a funnel to the mall parking lot and (people) never getting out of there," Otto said.

But Fateley and Commissioners Dr. Eugene Klingler and Rick Mann disagreed with opponents to closing the street, saying the plaza would beautify the area and reduce parking problems. Lindamood and Fiser voted against the measure.

In other action, the commission authorized city staff to develop a revised appeal process for zoning violations through the Board of Zoning Appeals.

The action at least temporarily killed a move by the Manhattan Board of Realtors to put a proposal to exempt some property from zoning restrictions before the city Planning Board. The appeal process would allow certain exemptions to zoning laws to be made, commissioners said.

The city recently announced that a study is being done to determine what to do about the many zoning violations. Some of the non-conformities were created when the University's enrollment increased and residents built apartments in homes to house the students.

Many of the apartments do not conform to zoning districts that dictate the number of families that can live in single buildings.

New weapon may prolong race for arms

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Air Force is ready to launch the first flight test of its new anti-satellite weapon despite the fears of arms control advocates that it could spark a new round in the international arms race.

The U.S. weapon, a small rocket fired from a high-flying jet, is designed to counter a Soviet anti-satellite (ASAT) weapon that has already been tested successfully, according to the Pentagon.

The first flight test of the American ASAT has been put off for several months, but the problems that led to the delay have now been solved, according to officials who declined to be named.

The $4 billion system involves an 18-foot long rocket slung beneath an F-15. The fighter carries the rocket up to about 60,000 feet and fires it, and the rocket hunts down its target and explodes.

Both superpowers are heavily reliant on satellites for communications and reconnaissance, particularly in systems designed to warn against nuclear attack.

In recent months, arms control advocates have predicted that the ASAT competition may lead to a new round of competition that could result in the military use of space.

When it approved the Pentagon budget authorization bill last fall, Congress forbade ASAT tests "against objects in space" until the White House tried to negotiate a ban on such weapons. But the Pentagon has interpreted the language to allow the first round of flight tests.

A year ago, Soviet President Yuri Andropov called for negotiations to limit the weapons. Officially, the United States said it would study any serious proposal, but U.S. officials have cautioned that such a treaty would be difficult to verify and there are no current negotiations under way.

Terrorists stage limousine attack, abduct Saudi consul in Lebanon

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Gunmen with automatic rifles abducted the Saudi Arabian consul from his limousine Tuesday, wounding his driver and beating his bodyguard. State-run Beirut radio said the kidnappers were trying to sabotage a Saudi-mediated security plan and "infiltrate the Lebanon situation."

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the abduction of consul Hussein Abdullah Farrash, 45, in Moslem west Beirut's seaside Rouche neighborhood. There was no word on whether the Saudi Embassy or the Lebanese government had received any ransom demands.

The state radio, meanwhile, said

Druse and Christian militiamen traded artillery and rocket barrages throughout the day in the Kharrub region overlooking Israel's defense line at the Awali River in southern Lebanon. No casualties were reported.

Elsewhere, police said, guns were silent after a day of heavy bombardment Monday that left 34 civilians dead and 100 wounded in Beirut's Christian sector and Druse-inhabited central mountain towns.

Beirut radio said the mid-morning abduction of Farrash was "engineered to deal another blow to the security plan and inflame the Lebanon situation."

"The party that ignited the situation in Beirut and the mountains yesterday is the beneficiary of the abduction," the radio said.

The radio commentary did not name any specific group. The security plan calls for disengagement of Lebanon's warring factions and extending Lebanese government control in some areas around Beirut.

The Voice of Lebanon radio station of the rightist Christian Phalange Party said the kidnappers belonged to Hezbollah, or Party of God, a pro-Iranian group of extremist Shiite Moslems.

Hezbollah, based in Syrian-controlled east Lebanon, was widely blamed in the Oct. 23 suicide truck-bombings killed 241 American and 58 French troops in Beirut.

Schultz to meet Gromyko in hopes of renewing talks

By The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Secretary of State George P. Shultz will tell the Soviet foreign minister on Wednesday that the United States would welcome talks on any level in an effort to control nuclear weapons and curb conventional forces in Europe.

Administration sources told The Associated Press Tuesday if the Soviets are reluctant to resume talks, the United States is ready to open other channels to reverse the U.S. and Soviet arms buildup.

Shultz, seeking to reopen a dialogue with the Soviet Union, will meet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko on Wednesday. Both are attending a 35-nation conference on peace and security in Europe.

It would be the first since the two wrangled in September over the Soviets' downing of a South Korean jetliner with 269 people aboard.

The Soviets broke off arms control talks last year after NATO started a five-year deployment of 572 new medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe. The West said its Euromissiles were needed to

Prairie photos donated, exhibited

In 1976, as part of the bicentennial celebration, the Smithsonian Institute mounted three copies of "The Tallgrass Prairie: An American Landscape Exhibition," by Patricia Duncan. To date, it is still one of the most popular exhibits traveling the country.

One of these copies now has been donated by the Smithsonian to the College of Architecture and Design at K-State and has become part of the college's permanent collection.

The Tallgrass Prairie is all but gone. What once covered a fourth of the country, from Indiana to Kansas and from Canada to Texas, now covers one percent of that range. Photographer Duncan recorded its personality on film. What emerged is an in-depth look at the complex ecosystem of wildflowers and grasses, native birds and mammals, and the people who lived there.

Many of Duncan's photographs are of K-State's Konza Prairie.

The photographs will be exhibited through Feb. 6 in the McCain Auditorium gallery.

Ag council begins goodwill tours

Members of the College of Agriculture Student Council start their spring goodwill tours Jan. 23 as they visit Kansas City area agricultural businesses.

The K-State representatives will visit Ralston Purina, Farmland Industries Inc., United Missouri Bank and the American Hereford Association.

Will Kirk, sophomore is agricultural economics and goodwill tour coordinator, said the tour gives students the opportunity to see the professional side of agricultural businesses and offers students an opportunity to show appreciation for the support of these businesses.

The trip to the Kansas City area is the first of four goodwill tours by council members. Students also will visit Wichita, Topeka and Manhattan agricultural businesses later in the spring.

UPC sponsors art rental program

K-State students, faculty and staff will have the opportunity to rent reproductions of famous paintings and prints Jan. 24 and 25 through the Union Program Council's Arts Committee art rental program.

The cost of each rental varies from $1 to $5 per semester.

Rentals will be available in the Union Courtyard from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. both days.

What triggers herpes' recurrence?

According to information distributed by the Information Center on Herpes Disease, it is not known exactly what causes repeated, active infection. Possible causes being considered are emotional stress, lack of sleep, poor diet, too much sun or wind, sexual relations or friction from wearing tight jeans or leotards. Recurring herpes generally tend to be less severe than the initial infection.

What is the Special Services Program and who can use it?

The Special Services Program offers assistance in study skills, developmental reading, writing skills and career planning. Tutoring in subjects such as science, math and psychology is provided by trained college students.

Program counselors and peer counselors are available for academic and personal counseling. Also, minority students can receive information about financial, social and cultural activities. In addition, services for the physically handicapped are available.

Because the program is federally funded, students must qualify for any of these free services. Ethnic minorities, the educationally or economically disadvantaged, the physically handicapped and older adults are encouraged to participate in the program.

The application procedure includes an interview and completion of a needs assessment form. If the student is accepted into the program, it is then determined which services will be most beneficial. The student and the counselor meet on a regular basis to discuss the student's progress and concerns. For more information about the Special Services Program, contact Samone Jolly, temporary instructor of student development, Holton 205, or call 532-5642.

What services are available for spouses of K-State students?

Several services are available for free or for a small fee. A spouse may use Farrell Library by presenting his or her spouse's student ID.

All services at Lafene Student Health Center are also available. A $55 fee must be paid to Lafene by the first 10 days of the student's enrollment and the spouse will receive his or her own card.

The L.P. Washburn Recreational Complex may be used by a spouse after he or she pays $3 per month for an entrance card. A spouse may also use the pool in the Natatorium for an additional 85 cents per month. These fees may be paid at the administrative office on the second floor of the Rec Complex.

Facilities at Ahearn Field House may be used by purchasing a card for $8 per couple or $5.50 per individual per semester. A locker or basket, including a towel, can be purchased for $7 and $5 respectively. Programs offered at Ahearn during the noon hour cost $15 per couple or $10 for an individual. These fees may be paid at the towel cage in Ahearn.

U-LearnNLine is a weekly column answering questions concerning academic, campus, community and general information. Please submit questions to U-LearnN, Holton 1 or call 532-6442. Space availability does not allow all questions to be answered through the column, but unpublished questions will be answered if the full name and phone number of the individual are enclosed.

Deadline for financial aid draws near

It's not too soon to start thinking about financial aid for the fall semester.

The priority date to be considered for scholarships was Jan. 15. The priority date for other programs, such as grants and loans, is March 15.

"Applications received after these deadlines will be processed, but placed in a holding file until funds become available," said Robert Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance.

During the 1982-83 school year, 2,237 K-State students took advantage of approximately $2,450,000 in scholarships through June 1983. Included in that figure were 243 athletic scholarships totaling $603,000.

Although information may circulate on college campuses across the nation about thousands of dollars in unused scholarships going to waste, Evans said he is unaware of any unused funds at K-State.

"High school counselors and students get publications about scholarships. Some of these (scholarship) donors do not deal with educational institutions who would see that the funds are used. These may be the funds to which the rumors of unused money refer," he said.

Because there is no excess in scholarship money, those applying for aid must be prompt and accurate when filling out financial assistance forms.

When Evans took his post in 1981, the error rate on financial aid applications submitted at K-State was approximately 60 percent, he said.

"The accuracy of the forms is extremely important. The number of applications we receive increases every year, so the competition becomes keener," he said.

Students often are disappointed because they did not meet deadlines or their forms were not accurately completed.

"That brings us in line with other institutions of our size which average a 30-percent error rate," Evans said.

A high grade point average (3.0 or better) is helpful, but is not mandatory for scholarship eligibility. A student with a lower GPA may be able to obtain aid from federal and state programs such as the work-study program.

In addition, some scholarships, such as music, speech and drama are awarded on the basis of talent.

"It is the aggressive student who meets the deadlines and submits an accurate form who gets the scholarship," Evans said.

Weather delays plaza construction

Depending on the weather, the completion date for the Laramie Plaza is scheduled for March 1.

Laramie Plaza, a shopping center under construction at 1125 and 1129 Laramie St., will house a variety of stores. Lessees haven't allowed the developer of the mall, American Investments Real Estate Inc., to reveal names of the stores that will occupy the project, said DeWayne Talley, broker for the firm.

"Some verbal commitments have been made on the remaining space, and good ground floor availability still exists," Talley said.

"We're particularly seeking a good fast-food restaurant, but we haven't decided on one yet," he said.

The $1.5 million mall is scheduled to conduct a grand opening about March 17.

Construction, prior to the December freeze, had been a few weeks ahead of schedule, Talley said. Hindered by December and January snows, construction is now on schedule, he said.

"I hope to have the grand opening before the St. Patrick's Day Run," Talley said, referring to a 10-kilometer running event.

Students suing after lab accidents

Chemistry experiments burn colleges

By College Press Service

PASADENA, Calif. — In the latest of a steady series of serious mishaps in college chemistry labs nationwide, a California Institute of Technology student was critically injured Jan. 4 while conducting a "routine" lab experiment.

Second-year graduate student Ramsay Bittar was severely injured when a glass flask he was using in a basic, inorganic synthesis procedure suddenly burst, sending shards of glass throughout the lab.

Physicians said one piece of the glass severed Bittar's main neck artery, depriving his brain of oxygen for up to two hours while the blood vessel was surgically grafted back together.

"I don't recall a more serious laboratory accident in the 12 years I've worked here," John Berkaw, Bittar's adviser, told the Cal Tech newspaper.

But similar mistakes have endangered students — and left faculty and schools open to lawsuits — at a number of other campuses during the last several years.

A University of New Mexico student, for instance, is suing that school for $2.7 million after he was severely burned by acid during a lab class last summer.

The student alleges the university and instructor did not properly maintain safety standards in the lab and failed to consider the danger of inexperienced students handling the acid.

Last April a University of Tennessee laboratory nearly burned down before officials discovered several gas jets (used to supply students' Bunsen burners with gas) had been left on and ignited.

Often, however, the danger to lab students is less obvious.

Rutgers, for instance, had to close its Smith Hall laboratory facilities two years ago after the Occupational Safety and Health Administration detected dangerous levels of extradiol benzoate in the building.

Seventeen students and faculty members have sued the school, claiming they suffered side-effects from exposure to the cancer-causing substance.

In 1982, 60 University of Washington chemistry students were exposed to a still-unknown chemical vapor which mysteriously engulfed the Bagley Lab building one afternoon.

Such incidents are rare, according to Steven Foster, program manager for the National Association of College and University Business Officers, because university labs tend to adhere to proven safety standards.

"The lab procedures tend to be very sound, based on the pact that there aren't (more) accidents," Foster said, adding that he doesn't know of many lawsuits resulting from such incidents.

"But college (lab) teachers in general don't have the safety training that good industrial sector scientists receive," Malcolm Renfrew, safety columnist for the Journal of Chemical Education, said.

"Even with reasonable precaution, accidents can happen," he said. Things like good lab supervision, use of face shields, safety shields, and exhaust hoods can help minimize chemical accidents.

Furthermore, Renfrew said, lawsuits against colleges and lab instructors are occurring "quite often these days, especially if there's a feeling that the lab was not maintained and safety standards were not practiced properly."

Indeed, lab accidents happen "fairly frequently, and some of the elements of omission exist in almost every one," said John Walker, director of Risk Management and Insurance at the University of Alabama-Birmingham.

Although many schools try to dodge potential lawsuits by claiming they are protected by the doctrine of sovereign immunity — which keeps state agencies from being taken to court — "people have found that institutions can be gotten at by suing specific individuals," Walker said.

"I now recommend that all teachers carry liability insurance available through such places as the American Chemical Society," Renfrew said. "If there's an accident, there's likely to be a lawsuit."

Edward Bittar, the injured Cal Tech student's brother, said the family has not considered legal action yet, while Bittar remains in "very guarded" condition in the hospital.

"We're thinking in terms of saving the man right now," he said.

Bill alters senate aide program

Students seeking senate aide positions for the 1984-85 term may face stiffer competition because of a bill passed recently limiting the number of aides to 20.

The new bill, adopted by Student Senate late last semester, also reverses the decision previously giving aides University credit for their participation in student government.

The action is an attempt to establish more concrete guidelines for the senate aide program, said Lori Leu, senate chairman and senior in social sciences. She said the results of a senate evaluation revealed several abuses in the program.

"We hope the bill will put the program back on an even keel," Leu said. "There were about 42 aides last semester. Each aide was assigned to a senator. Their duties included research and support activities, as well as mandatory attendance at senate meetings.

"Some senators had work for their aides, others did not," Leu said. "Limiting the selection to 20 seems more realistic considering the amount of work we have."

Under the new ruling, the 20 aides will serve as a pool from which senators and committee chairmen can select help when they need it. The pool provides about one aide for every three senators.

The decision to discontinue the credit option also was due to inconsistencies in the aides' level of involvement, Leu said. Before the new ruling, aides could earn up to one credit per semester with only minimum participation.

Although some still argue that credit should be offered, Leu said the majority of senate aides who gave input on the issue seemed to favor the changes.

"There is a lot of interest in student government," Leu said. "We've never had trouble filling the positions. The role of senate aide lets students see how senate runs, and some use that experience to run for senator later."

Senate aides who will serve during the term beginning Feb. 16 will be chosen by a five-member panel consisting of the senate chairman, senate vice chairman, senate operations committee chairman, personnel selections committee chairman and senate aide coordinator. Selection will be conducted under the terms of the new bill.

"I think the bill is good," Vicki Phillips, senate aide, said. "Experience should be the most important incentive for the job, but interest in the position under the new terms will probably depend on whether others share this attitude."

Advising changes necessary

K-State President Duane Acker recently outlined goals for the University for 1984. One of those goals was to recognize and acknowledge "those advising units doing an outstanding job of academic advising and to help others move forward."

By recognizing such excellence in academic advising, the administration hopes to encourage other advisers to work toward similar quality and give those receiving praise personal satisfaction.

Currently, some students graduate from college without consulting an adviser. Others complain they've been misled by advisers in their majors, and still others rely completely on their advisers.

Some advisers enjoy advising students. They are aware of curriculum changes and keep students informed of ever-changing requirements, as well as encouraging extracurricular involvement. These are the academic advisers Acker wishes to acknowledge.

Other faculty members, however, are not able to devote the time away from the classroom and research activities that many of them consider to be their top priority. To them, advising is a time-consuming chore, and that attitude is often reflected in the quality of their advice. These are the people who "need to move forward."

However, it is not completely the administration's duty to improve this area of education at K-State.

Student and faculty feedback concerning advisers is imperative to ensure successful improvement. The administration cannot be expected to monitor activities in a mostly student-oriented area if students don't complain about or praise their advisers. Department heads, deans and the vice-president for student affairs would be appropriate recipients of complaints and commendations. Also, advisers themselves must make suggestions for improving the process.

A standardized advising process should be developed. The present advising system varies within the University from college to college. In some colleges there are full-time advisers who are employed solely for the purpose of advising students. But in other colleges, advisers are also full-time professors, thus dividing their time between teaching, research and advising.

Perhaps those teaching and advising could be paid more than their current salaries for the time devoted to advising. As a result, the rewards for advising would be greater and perhaps taken more seriously by faculty members.

Most important, however, is that the advising process be regarded as a relevant part of the education process. Both administrators and students need to devote more time and attention to this activity. Many students are confused and wary of planning their schedules and rely on their advisers to assist them. Instead, students should be aware of their own requirements and be prepared with a tentative schedule when they go in for advising, since it isn't the advisers' job to plan and schedule classes.

Advisers themselves should be aware of the importance of advising in education. A competent adviser is a necessary and integral part of a university education.

The Vatican's political influence

A new force in world politics is fast emerging: the Vatican.

Led by the most outspoken pope of modern times, John Paul II, the Holy See is incorporating politics along with traditional Catholic rule. John Paul is famous for his globe-trotting tours. He has spoken in the United States, Central America and Europe, even in the face of political strife in his native Poland and terrorist threats on his life.

In fact, John Paul has railed the U.S. for failing to establish terms of disarmament with the Soviet Union. The pope would like to be a preeminent force in world affairs and to influence world leaders.

Although the U.S. has been represented at the Vatican by presidential envoys in the past, President Reagan has changed that, with the pope's approval. In an effort both to influence papal affairs and possibly win the Catholic vote in November, Reagan has nominated an ambassador to the Vatican, the first for the U.S. in the 20th century.

A ban on funding ambassadors to the Vatican was enacted in the last century. Between 1848 and 1867 the United States had a mission at the Holy See, but a wave of anti-Catholicism in the United States and a loss of power for the pope in Italy brought it to an end. Presidents had circumvented the ban by appointing envoys, with less power than ambassadors. Last November, however, Congress repealed the ban.

It is likely that the nomination of William A. Wilson, a California investor and real estate developer and longtime associate of the president's, will be approved by the Senate.

For John Paul, this relationship with the United States gives him a greater opportunity to influence world events. He may be given greater license to help mediate conflicts, make overtures toward peace and settle political disputes.

Reagan also probably sees many benefits to the new relationship. First of all, the Vatican is a vast warehouse of knowledge, especially political. For the United States to have access to this could give it an advantage in solving conflicts — whether in the Middle East, Central America or eastern Europe. The pontiff may be willing to share such accumulated knowledge in order to ensure world peace. For example, U.S. officials gained insight last October into Middle East conflicts by talking with bishops and priests from the region at a synod at the Vatican.

Reagan may also see this as a prime opportunity to influence the Catholic vote. His conservatism appears to be reinforced by allowing the Holy See greater involvement in political affairs.

But, as always, one question will arise in such instances regarding church and state. Our country was founded on the principle of the separation of the two, due to a long European history of continual state interference in church affairs. More and more, however, especially with Reagan's ambassador nomination, the two are becoming intertwined again.

What is not surprising is the pope's willingness to take advantage of opportunities to influence world politics in the context of peace. And only slightly surprising is Reagan's willingness to use the Catholic church to influence American politics.

Reagan is taking advantage of a prime political situation — papal political involvement — to further his conservative image. With his ambassador having direct access to the pope, Reagan is creating a line of communication between a dominant church and the Washington administration.

What remains to be seen is how Reagan will actually use this new political access, beyond reinforcing his conservative views and gaining important foreign relations clout.

Diehl, Brian LaRue, Andy Nelson, Andy Ostmeier, Karra Porter, Dan Robison, Mike Turner and Lee White.

THANKS, BUT I'VE DECIDED TO ACCEPT ONLY FIVE OF YOUR RECOMMENDATIONS...

Coming soon: student elections

Don't look now, but the candidates will soon be out.

I'm not talking about the presidential candidates. They've been "out and about" for a few months to a few years.

No, I'm talking about the annual campus comedy — elections for student body president, Student Senate and the Board of Student Publications.

I'm not trying to discourage anyone from running for these offices. On the contrary — I hope there is a record amount of candidates running this year. There is no better way to learn about a democracy than to practice running one. The experience gained from running for these offices cannot be learned from textbooks.

I love elections. The best — and worst — of people can be brought out in just a few debates. Or an unflattering article. Or just in the strain and stress of trying to figure out how to spend less than a small fortune on trying to become the next student body president from Podunk, Kan.

I've never run for student body president here. It is an appealing job, what with the hobnobbing with the Board of Regents, the Kansas Legislature, campus leaders, the Collegian...it's enough to cause nightmares or delusions of grandeur. The experiences of being the student representative could make many heads swell — possibly even break.

Being a student senator is also an important job, although it too has its hazards. A student senator attends various committee meetings, college council meetings and planning sessions. The job is time-consuming to say the least.

Not only must senators put in many hours at meetings, they must be able to handle criticism — both from constituents and the press. Edee Dalke gave some senators more criticism than they could handle last semester. Her columns were never dull. Unfortunately, Edee has graduated.

All right, stop cheering. You never know who may step into Edee's shoes.

If you think being a senator is a glamour job, you may want to think again. Senate allocates money — remember the $25.25 student activity fee you paid almost two weeks ago? You don't? Check your fee card. You paid it if you are a full-time student. For the 1983-84 academic year, students paid $50.50 into this activity fund. In addition, students have chipped in $6 for remodeling Holton Hall, $33 for the coliseum, $8.50 for the football stadium bond, $15 for recreation, $23 for the Union, $110 for student health and $20 for an academic services fee. While senate doesn't control the amount of all the fees, it can be used to gauge student opinion on fee increases and how students want the money allocated.

Being elected a member of the Board of Student Publications also is a big responsibility. Board members choose the Collegian editor and advertising manager for each semester, including summer school. The members also choose the editor of the Royal Purple. K-State has had a strong tradition of award-winning publications, including two five-star All-American newspapers in the past year and many All-American yearbooks. Don't be surprised to find out there will be more All-American K-State publications before this academic year is over. Whenever awards are won, the Board shares in the victory — as does the rest of the University community.

So you still want to run for office after all? Good. I hope you will enjoy the experience. Who knows, your victory here may lead to bigger things besides working on homework until 3 a.m.

I am not an expert on the rules which govern elections here. I'm not a campaign manager. I do know that you can have your questions answered by talking to the people in the Student Governing Association office, which is located next to the "plastic-money machines" in the Union. They will be glad to help you find out what you need to know.

Another good way to find out what the rules are and what the jobs require is to talk to someone who holds the job you want. You might be able to learn campaign strategies, how to save money on campaign materials, what deadlines need to be met and the duties and responsibilities of a particular office.

The next step is to get a good campaign manager and plan your strategy. The earlier you start planning your campaign, the better. Early planning allows a candidate to become better acquainted with the rules and regulations imposed on the campaign and allows for more research into issues of concern to students. An early start also allows a candidate to find and organize student support for his campaign. It also can reduce the last-minute details which cause many to spend late nights later in the campaign.

Running a campaign costs money. Signs, posters, buttons, Collegian ads...it adds up quickly. Again, get a copy of the rules and find out what the expenditure limit is before you make plans to run a full-page ad in the Collegian for two weeks. Don't spend Aunt Gertrude's Christmas money all at one time.

Now is the time to decide what information you want to use to introduce yourself to the electorate. We all know that your mom loves you. It really isn't important to tell us you took first place in the town spelling bee when you were in the third grade. Tell us how you stand on the issues now facing students, such as more fee increases, how to improve the parking situation, how to get the sidewalks on the west side of campus cleaned, how to make the campus more accessible to the handicapped and whatever else you think is important.

I hope this column has you thinking about running for an office. There is always room in these offices for intelligent, caring people.

It is easy for someone in my position to criticize senators, the student body president or the Board of Student Publications members for a particular stand taken on an issue. But this criticism is all part of democracy: the right of dissent allows for other views to be aired and considered. The system has its flaws, but I wouldn't trade it for anything.

Besides, if no one ran for office, who would keep your best interests in mind when deciding how your money should be spent?

Bacon-cheeseburger payoff

Professors bet on anything 'interesting'

By CONNIE WOODARD
Staff Writer

One hot summer day George Dent Wilcoxon, professor of history, commented on the number of flies in his office.

"Why are there so many flies in the world? I wish there weren't any more flies than worms. Worms never bother me," he said.

Wilson Tripp, professor emeritus of mechanical engineering, replied, "How do you know there aren't more worms than flies?"

"Well, I don't, but I feel pretty sure there are."

"Wanna bet?"

That was the most outlandish bet remembered by two K-State professors who have been wagering everything, from the big bang theory of the beginning of the universe to whether the flow of the Blue Nile river is greater than the flow of the White Nile river.

The two faculty members, who met in 1946, have been betting for 20 years.

They are great believers in walking as well as in wagering and have always walked home together. They have hiked together in Yosemite, Calif. and in the Tetons in Jackson Hole, Wyo.

"We're devoted walkers, and we believe that's one way to remain healthy," Wilcoxon said.

Wilcoxon lives on 17th Street and Tripp lives on Poyntz Street. At lunchtime Wilcoxon stops by Tripp's office to talk for a few minutes before the two start their trek down 17th Street. They talk about anything that is happening — items in the news or things they have recently read.

"I think he was the one who began to sort of provoke an interest in things by challenging statements of mine, saying, 'I don't think so. Like to make a bet on it,'" Wilcoxon said.

Usually the two bet on current events. But Tripp has a particular interest in boxing, so Wilcoxon likes to bet with him on that topic even though he usually loses. Wilcoxon lost on the Muhammad Ali-Larry Holmes fight and also on the recent Marvin Hagler-Roberto Duran fight.

"I should say that sometimes I make those boxing bets tongue-in-cheek. I really thought that Hagler was going to win too. I just kidded Tripp a lot, telling him he was underestimating Duran and that the plucky Panamanian spirit was going to win for him in the long run. I didn't really think so, but I told him so," Wilcoxon said.

The payoff used to be a steak dinner but "they've (steak dinners) gotten more expensive over the years, so we've switched to bacon cheeseburgers," Wilcoxon said.

For the steak dinners, the two would go out in the evening and have dinner at the Ramada Inn or some other local restaurant. The bacon cheeseburgers are due to be paid off at Hardees, which they prefer because it's in walking distance of their homes.

Wilcoxon said they average 25-30 bets a year and estimated that Tripp has won approximately 60 percent of the bets.

Currently, there are three bets pending. Two of these wagers are related to Tripp's field, which gives him an edge over Wilcoxon.

One involves the development of a nitrogen engine which could revolutionize the automotive industry because of the amount of nitrogen available in the air.

"I kidded Wilson about it a lot. He said, 'Oh, that will never work, nitrogen won't make a good fuel at all,'" Wilcoxon said. For Wilcoxon to win, the nitrogen engine has to be adopted by an automobile firm by Jan. 1, 1986.

There is also a bacon cheeseburger riding on the hydrogen engine. For Wilcoxon to win, 3 percent of the automotive industries have to be energized by hydrogen by Jan. 1, 1988.

The last bet pending involves retired football star Jim Brown, who holds the all-time rushing record after playing in the National Football League for nine years. According to Wilcoxon, in a recent magazine article Brown was quoted as saying that Franco Harris has remained in the NFL for 13 years just to break Brown's record. Brown mentioned coming out of retirement, at age 47, to protect his record. Wilcoxon offered to wager that Harris would break Brown's record. But Tripp agreed only to take the bet on the basis that, if Brown succeeds in coming back out of retirement and plays at least half of the next two seasons, he will retain his record.

For complex bets, such as the one they made comparing birthrates in India and China, they research the subject.

"Sometimes we'll question each other's figures. We might say 'you need a better source than the one you got there.' We'll try to track it down to the ultimate, official records if we can," Wilcoxon said.

Wilcoxon's favorite sport is baseball. Since he is originally from the Los Angeles area, he is a Dodger fan. Tripp, who comes from the San Francisco area, has "no love for the Dodgers, and maybe somewhat of the reverse," Wilcoxon said.

"When I would act enthusiastic about Fernando Valenzuela, Tripp would tell me that Valenzuela is one of those flash-in-the-pans who's not going to last very long," Wilcoxon said.

Tripp has reasoned that Valenzuela's record will get worse because his chief pitch is the screwball. The screwball is sort of a curve in reverse — difficult to throw and very hard on the arm — and in time will ruin his arm, Wilcoxon said.

Tripp has devised a new system for rating pitchers' overall performance to back up his side of the wager.

The two have bet on Valenzuela's performance the last two years, and Tripp has won both times because the performance worsened each year.

"He took pity on me and decided to give me a break next year," Wilcoxon said.

Tripp agreed that if Valenzuela's record doesn't drop as much as Tripp projects during the 84 season, then Wilcoxon will win, even though it may drop somewhat.

Media from San Francisco, Kansas City, San Diego, British Columbia and Wichita have contacted Tripp and Wilcoxon in the past week showing an interest in Tripp's formula for rating baseball pitchers.

They usually don't bet on K-State sports because their emotions are too involved in the subject.

But they did bet once on whether Ed Nealy, former K-State engineering major and basketball player, had ever been exposed to the Second Law of Thermodynamics. To win the bet, Tripp had to track down the classes Nealy had taken, the instructors he had had and the textbooks that had been used. He finally discovered the thermodynamics law in one of the textbooks.

"We'll bet on anything that sounds interesting at the drop of a hat. We sort of spar for position and try a bit of one-upmanship on each other," Wilcoxon said.

By the way, there are more worms than flies in the world.

Gandhi's offspring to speak on peace

World peace advocate Mohandas Gandhi's great-grandson is scheduled to speak at noon Thursday in the Union Canteen.

Dr. S.K. Gandhi, Topeka heart surgeon, will be the first guest of the semester in the "Let's Talk About It" series sponsored by the Union Program Council.

Gandhi's address, "Is Peace a Fantasy?" will include comments about his great-grandfather, India and young people's involvement in establishing world peace.

After finishing medical school in Bombay, India, in 1967, Gandhi came to the United States, where he studied at Wayne State University in Detroit and then began practicing in Youngstown, Ohio.

Later, he moved to Topeka and began the open-heart surgery program at St. Francis Hospital. At that time, he used the K-State College of Veterinary Medicine to train surgical personnel.

The "Let's Talk About It" series is sponsored by the UPC Issues and Ideas Committee to discuss current events and controversial topics. The programs are free and the public is invited.

Report finds minor college discipline problems

By College Press Service

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration's recent release of suggestions to toughen school discipline probably will not have much impact on colleges, where a crackdown on drinking and student parties has been in the works over the last several years, officials said.

"I don't think the problem at the college level is as severe," Gary Bauer, undersecretary in the Department of Education, said. Bauer is chairman of the President's Working Group on School Discipline, which recently completed a report emphasizing the rights of attentive students over those who misbehave.

"The report found that it (discipline) is such a significant problem that it is having an extremely negative effect on performance in high school," Bauer said.

The study, "Disorder in Our Schools," proposes the departments of Justice and Education join local school districts to curtail the legal options students have when suspended. Reagan will use the report to focus national attention on an issue that needs solving at state and local levels, Bauer said.

Bauer conceded the possibility that some high school students may carry discipline problems into college, or lose their college opportunity because of bad behavior.

"But a student's own self-interest mitigates against too many severe problems" in college, he said.

"Students don't have to be here," Roland Buck, assistant vice chancellor for student services at the University of Missouri, said. "Most of MU's disciplinary problems are handled informally with an administrator and rarely before a formal student/faculty judicial board," he said.

"The trend in university discipline is for students involved in conduct cases to have more administrative hearings," said Scott Rickard, vice chancellor for student affairs at the University of Maryland and author of a 1981 study on college discipline.

Students are choosing to go to administrators rather than to peer panels for two reasons, Rickard said.

"I think they have more trust in the system now. Students feel they get more confidentiality." In dealing with administrators, students "know what the consequences are." Before their peers, "sanctions are tougher than they used to be."

Climbers to scale Mount Everest

SEATTLE — A group of 10 veteran mountain climbers, including members of an ill-fated assault on Mount Everest two years ago, will attempt a new climb of the world's tallest peak this fall. Lou Whittaker, who led the 1982 Everest expedition which ended with the death of Marty Hoey, told a news conference Monday the group will attempt to be the first to climb the mountain's North Wall. He said several members of the 1982 expedition will be on the new team.

Filmmaker rates audiences

NEW YORK — Film director John Huston, whose movies often have been better received in France than in the United States, calls the French "the smartest people in the world." French audiences are "the most intelligent, and they pride themselves on being sharp and discerning," he said in the current House & Garden magazine. "American audiences don't give a hang whether they are discerning or not. They want to be entertained. I'm not sure if I admire one more than I do the other."

General's death may be suicide

SAN ANTONIO, Texas — The death of a two-star general found bound and hanged at Fort Sam Houston last week has tentatively been ruled a suicide, The Associated Press learned Tuesday. A source, who asked not to be identified, said, "all the evidence at this point indicates suicide." Maj. Gen. Robert Ownby was found hanging last Wednesday in a stairwell of a Fort Sam Houston headquarters building in San Antonio, his hands bound behind him.

Violations found in day-care home

RUSSELL — The state has revoked the registration of a Russell day-care home after safety violations were found and the operator's husband was accused of child molestation, authorities said. Safety violations at the home were discovered by a Kansas Department of Health and Environment inspector who went to the facility after a complaint was lodged against Cameron Carter, the husband of the home's operator, authorities said. Carter was charged Jan. 11 in Russell County District Court with two counts of taking indecent liberties with a minor, said County Attorney Ray Cooley. Carter, 68, of Russell, was released on bond, Cooley said.

Astronauts to help open pavilion

SINGAPORE — Two American astronauts arrived here Tuesday from Hong Kong to take part in the opening of the Asia Aerospace Exhibition. A U.S. Embassy spokesman said Dr. Norman E. Thagart and Maj. Sherwood C. Spring will participate in today's opening of the American pavilion, the largest in the exhibition. They also will present talks to defense officials, speak to students and meet the public on Saturday at the exhibition before their departure on Sunday.

Weather

Cloudy today, with a 30 percent chance of snow. Highs around 10. Northwest winds 10 to 20 mph. Mostly clear tonight, lows around zero. Mostly sunny Thursday, highs in the low 20s.

Radioactive microspheres (minute globules or cell-like structures) are then injected into the left ventricle through the tube. A second tube placed in a peripheral artery allows a blood sample to be taken at a known rate. The amount of radioactivity in this sample can determine blood flow to any organ, as well as cardiac output, he said.

During the experiment, the geese are exposed to three environments containing different percentages of oxygen-filled air.

Measurements are made during exposure to all three oxygen concentrations. The amount of blood flowing to the brain in these geese when in a low oxygen environment can then be determined.

To help find the mechanisms that control blood flow, Faraci is experimenting with adenosine, a substance which dilates heart and blood vessels.

"Increasing evidence supports the hypothesis that adenosine is the agent responsible for cerebral and coronary vasodilation (dilation of the blood vessels) during hypoxia in mammals," he said.

These adenosine experiments, using Peking ducks, involve the use of theophylline, an adenosine blocker, and dipyridamole, an adenosine inhibitor, to determine whether the compound is involved in vascular control.

"If we know something about what chemicals are used to control the smooth muscle around the blood vessels, then we may be able to use this information to alter blood flow to various body organs in mammals," Faraci said.

The department has a total of 23 Bar-headed geese, which weigh three to four pounds and are fairly tame compared to most wild birds. They were purchased from a breeder in Minnesota and can live up to 30 years, Fedde said.

The Bar-headed goose is most noted for its ability to fly over the tallest mountains in the world, the Himalayas, without difficulty. The geese fly up to 30,000 feet, while common birds fly at 2,000 to 3,000 feet. The Bar-headed geese are required to fly so high because of their migrational flight pattern, Fedde said.

This pattern involves flying from their winter home in India to their nesting area north of the Himalayas, in the high plateau of Tibet. This is a fact that Fedde and Faraci agree is a major factor behind the need for the geese to be able to adapt to the elevation.

These birds, in addition, have the remarkable ability to quickly achieve the high altitude and their destination.

"They start out from sea level in northwest India and in three to four days will hit their summer grounds," Fedde said.

When humans attempt to climb Mount Everest (29,048 feet), an oxygen supply is a must. Unlike the Bar-headed goose, humans have no way of adjusting the amount of blood supplied to the brain.

"At the elevation of Mount Everest, the partial pressure of oxygen is so low that the reduced partial pressure in the lungs, which is even lower, is barely sufficient for survival," Fedde said.

"When people get on that mountain (Everest) or at that elevation (without oxygen), they tend to become somewhat disoriented. Sometimes they really don't know which way is up," he said.

Fedde added that with little oxygen, it is extremely difficult to do anything more than just sit. The mildest of exercise requires intense strain, and it takes the climbers minutes to move a step.

If an improvement of oxygen delivery to the brain can be found, then stroke patients and mountain climbers alike may benefit, thanks to Fedde, Faraci and the Bar-headed geese.

Mahaffey

One of those moves would have been for Mahaffey to transfer to the Department of Computer Science, where the then-department head had requested the switch. But Koeppel didn't suggest the move.

The other move would have been for Mahaffey to transfer to the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies to teach parks management classes. Koeppel said he balked at that idea because "I was told there were faculty members who would be upset over the transfer."

Schauner attacked Koeppel's signing of the dismissal letter by asking about the provost's knowledge of the forestry department conflicts. But Koeppel replied that his duty as provost often required him to sign documents without him having much prior knowledge of the situation.

In this case, however, Koeppel said he relied on the words of College of Agriculture officials that students were willing to testify against Mahaffey.

Victoria Ellman, a former student of Mahaffey's from September 1979 to December 1982, testified Monday that Mahaffey had made the comment in her Parks Administration class that a drawback to women employees is that they're "not good one week out of the month," referring to menstrual cycles.

After the statement, she said, he ended the discussion by saying he knew it was true because he had seen studies on the subject.

Ellman, who said she had transferred from the University of Kansas to K-State because of the natural resources management degree offered here, said Mahaffey made her and other students afraid to express their opinions in class and she considered that intimidation.

The hearing is expected to continue through this week.

Photojournalist recounts problems, delays during invasion of Grenada, Shultz

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

Associated Press photographer Pete Leabo spoke to 200 people last night in the Union Little Theatre, relating his experiences as a journalist in the recent U.S. invasion of Grenada.

The 27-year-old staff photographer for the Kansas City Bureau of the Associated Press was one of the first journalists allowed on the Caribbean island following the invasion.

The Reagan administration would not allow any press coverage for the initial invasion by American forces, fearing the attack might not be considered a legitimate invasion. Reagan thought that had the press known, it would have destroyed the secrecy of the mission, Leabo said.

"I don't believe that for a minute," he said.

Leabo encountered numerous problems throughout his coverage of the war, which lasted two and a half weeks. No telephones or other forms of communications were allowed on the island once the American troops landed.

Journalists covering the invasion had to fly in each morning from Barbados and fly back each night. Transportation was a "nightmare" — hours were wasted in anticipation of flights in and out of Grenada, Leabo said. Because of the time lost in transportation, the journalist and his crew received only about two hours of sleep each night.

Most of each night was spent transmitting film to New York via the telephone lines. Because transmitting required 15 minutes for each picture, Leabo set an egg-timer and slept in 14-minute intervals while the pictures were being processed.

Once on the island, taxis became the popular mode of transportation. Taking advantage of the desperate journalism crews, drivers charged between $100 to $200 a day, Leabo said.

Living quarters also were at a minimum. Most of the hotels were closed due to the invasion. Those that were open were booked with four to five people in a room. Ironically, Leabo's cab driver found an unoccupied hotel.

"I was the sole occupant," Leabo said. After settling in with his necessary equipment, he decided to take a shower.

"A couple of soldiers opened up with M-16s underneath the window where I was showering — I didn't know whether to get my camera and run out there or what," Leabo said. He left the hotel the next day.

A sailboat was used by some journalists in an attempt to get onto the island without the aid of the military. The crew in the boat were fired on by U.S. Naval ships. Later, a Navy helicopter tried unsuccessfully to capsize the boat with waves.

"The navy had orders to sink or shoot anyone trying to get on the island, even if they were American journalists," Leabo said.

The most surprising event for many of the news media was the outpouring of affection for the U.S. troops by the Grenadians.

The natives genuinely welcomed the American military and journalists into the country by shaking hands and spouting thank you's, Leabo said.

"To the natives, the Americans had not committed an invasion, but rather a rescue mission," Leabo said.

Once the initial fighting was over, photographers covered the restructuring of Grenada. With the installation of the new government and return to normal life, the press had little left to do on Grenada, he said, adding that the departure of the Russian, Cuban and Libyan diplomats generated the most excitement. The Russian diplomats tried to smuggle two cases of Soviet AK-47 assault rifles out, but failed.

"This was the first war I've covered," Leabo said. "I was a bit apprehensive, but that's what I'm paid for." He said he didn't know how he would react to being shot at, but felt his apprehension was normal among reporters.

"There was no alternative to military force in Grenada. After seeing how the natives felt towards the American forces, I felt the invasion was justified under the circumstances."

counter existing Soviet SS-20 nuclear weapons.

The Soviets won't return until NATO pulls out its new rockets. Talks on ocean-spanning nuclear weapons and conventional forces also are on hold, and the Soviets refuse to set a date for resumption.

Shultz has already had several talks at the State Department with Anatoly F. Dobrynin, the Soviet ambassador to Washington, to see if some of the chill can be taken out of the frozen relationship.

At the opening of the conference, Shultz did not offer any proposals to lure the Soviets back to the negotiating tables, and urged the Soviets to lift the Iron Curtain, saying America "does not recognize the legitimacy of the artificially imposed division of Europe."

Shultz also proposed a global ban on chemical weapons and a program to ease anxieties in Europe by exchanging information on military maneuvers in order to prevent an inadvertent war.

Gromyko is to address the conference today.

East German Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer urged a treaty between the NATO and Warsaw Pact renouncing use of military force, a freeze on nuclear arsenals, nuclear-free zones in Europe, a European ban on chemical weapons and a freeze or cut in military budgets.

Shultz jabbed at the Soviet Union, saying, "some nations seek global or regional military superiority or resort to threats of intimidation," but the United States "seeks no such superiority."

Committee rejects change in midsemester grade policy

K-State's midterm grade policy will not be changed, at least not in the near future.

Members of the Academic Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate had drew up a proposal last semester to send out midterm grades only to first-semester students who were doing unsatisfactory work in a course.

The committee submitted the proposal to be placed on the senate agenda, but it was rejected.

Senate has decided to keep the current policy, which is to send midterm grades to every first-semester freshman and transfer student.

"It might just disappear or it may be picked up again," John Eck, professor of physics and member of the committee, said of the proposal.

"It was decided it wasn't ready to go yet. They (the committee) thought it (the current policy) was currently adequate," he said, but added, "It's not over yet."

Another proposal may be submitted to the board, but nothing is currently being planned.

Civella family suspect in bombing

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City police said Tuesday they believe they know who was involved in the bombing death last week of a reputed mob figure, but lack enough evidence to solve the slaying.

"We definitely have a strong idea who made the bomb, who planted the bomb and who detonated the bomb," said Sgt. Jerry Fortney, who has led the investigation into Carl Spero's death. "They know we know it."

Fortney said those under suspicion are linked to the Civella crime family, with which Spero reportedly had feuded for years.

Spero, 44, was killed Jan. 9 in an explosion that ripped through the office of a used-car lot in which he held part interest. Confined to a wheelchair after a 1978 attack by gunmen who barged into a Kansas City tavern, he was the fourth of six Spero brothers to die violently.

In the late 1970s the FBI tape recorded a conversation between reputed Kansas City crime boss Nick Civella and his brother, Carl, in which they discussed how to kill Spero. Nick Civella died of cancer in March, and Carl Civella is in prison for skimming Las Vegas gambling revenue.

Fortney said he believes the murder was carried out by people tied to the Civella organization. He attributed his suspicions to confidential informants interviewed by detectives.

Fortney said his squad of four detectives investigating Spero's slaying was to disband Tuesday. But two investigators will continue working on the case, a police spokesman said.

Aggies on the move: competing at nationals...

By RHONDA WESSEL
Agriculture Editor

K-State agriculture students and faculty alike made their presence known at the 78th National Western in Denver last week.

The College of Agriculture was represented by four judging teams, the Block and Bridle club, a faculty speaker and Miss American Angus.

"We also were represented by many students who are interested in the show or those whose family had livestock entered in the National Western," Miles McKee, professor of animal science, said.

The National Western began in 1906 in a tent on the Denver Stockyards grounds, and it has been growing in size since then, said Bill Saul, public relations director of the National Western.

The stock show is a non-profit organization dedicated to educating the public about agriculture and the production of food. There were many booths and exhibits set up for the 300,000 visitors.

"The attendance is down about 2,000 from last year. We have had the coldest and snowiest weather for the stock show that I can remember," Saul said.

"We have had visitors and exhibitors from 42 states, five Canadian provinces and 20 countries. We have an international information center which helps the foreign visitors and keeps track of how many countries are represented," Saul said.

"We have added a lot of things to the National Western over the past years," he said. "We have increased the number of breed shows for cattle from five or six when the stock show began to about 20 or 30 because of the increased popularity of the exotic breeds of cattle."

New events in the 1984 National Western included a draft horse and mule show and a dance. The country western dance was held in the coliseum on the stockyard grounds and will probably be continued next year because of its popularity, said Saul, adding that another new aspect of the National Western was its being split into two divisions.

"We had a National Youth Western in the fall which was followed by the National Western in January. This enabled us to allow more youth events like 4-H and FFA contests at the youth show."

There hasn't been a decision whether there will be two National Westerns next year, Saul said. The final decision will be made in early February.

"We organize the judging contests for students of universities like K-State to carry out the purpose of the stock show," he said. "We feel that it is a beneficial learning experience, and the contests' results are not necessarily the most important aspect of the contests."

K-State coaches and faculty members agree the judging contests are valuable learning experiences which add to the education provided in the classroom. "I never encourage students to skip class. However, they do need this type of experience, and Denver provides this," McKee said.

Members of judging teams learn to think on their feet, make decisions, represent a specific area of agriculture and communicate ideas, he said.

"Judging on a team is one of the greatest things that a student can do while in college. He may develop more personality and character that wouldn't necessarily be brought out in the classroom," said Dennis Sigler, assistant professor of animal sciences and coach of the horse judging team.

"It (judging) teaches students to make decisions on their own and helps them relate to the current trends in the horse industry," Sigler said.

Judging team members develop close friendships and become some of the most loyal alumni of the College of Agriculture and K-State, said Michael Dikeman, professor of animal sciences and the meats team judging coach.

Members of the judging teams also spent a lot of time on the road in preparation for the Denver contests. The wool team travelled last Tuesday to Wyoming to work out on judging wool.

"We work out in Wyoming because the wool produced there is more the type the team will be judging," said Clifford Spaeth, associate professor of extension animal sciences and coach of the wool team. "The wool produced in this area is usually higher shrinking, which means that it is dirty and greasier than wool produced in Wyoming. The wool there is a much drier type of wool."

Although emphasis is placed on the learning aspect of judging and not necessarily winning, all four teams placed high in each judging category at the National Western.

The wool team placed third in the overall meats judging competition. The squad was led by Lon James, senior in animal sciences and industry, who placed fourth overall in the individual competition.

The meats team placed second in the overall competition. The individuals in the top 10 finishers of the contest were David Clawson, sophomore in general agriculture, who tied for second place; Marc Yung, sophomore in general agriculture, who placed sixth and Kathy Holmes, sophomore in general agriculture, who nabbed the 10th spot.

The horse team garnered third-place honors in the overall competition. Scott Barrows, senior in animal sciences and industry, placed first in the overall individual competition, and Loy James, senior in agricultural education, finished 10th.

The livestock team, which is coached by Bill Able, professor of animal sciences, placed third overall. In the individual competition, Galen Huck, junior in animal sciences and industry, took second-place honors.

K-State also was represented by the National Miss American Angus queen, Cindy Houck, freshman in pre-vet medicine. Houck received the title in late October.

"I have passed out ribbons and met a lot of people in the Angus industry," Houck said. "I have also seen a lot of K-State students and faculty at the National Western."

"We have been out here for three days. The most exciting part of the Angus show at the National Western is the carload judging. This involves the judging of 15 head of Angus produced by the same breeder and usually sired by one or two of his herd bulls," Houck said.

The Block and Bridle national convention also was held in Denver at the same time as the National Western. The club finished second in overall competition and received honorable mention in yearbook and scrapbook competition.

Anita Conley, senior in animal sciences and industry, received honorable mention in the junior merit competition of the Block and Bridle convention. This is based on student activity in their respective clubs.

McKee was a speaker at the convention. He spoke about the opportunities for a college career in the universities.

For some students, the word "interruption" meant a shortened Christmas vacation. For several students from the College of Agriculture the word meant a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

Eleven students from K-State, with others from Nebraska, Iowa and Missouri, took an intercession course called Comparative Agriculture. They spent five days in Australia, seven days in New Zealand and two days in Hawaii.

"We primarily tried to see a very diverse group of agriculture," Gerry Posler, professor of agronomy, said. During their travels the students stayed with farm families, toured farms and talked with farmers about differences in farming practices between the United States, Australia and New Zealand.

"I learned how progressive we are," Lori Thompson, senior in agriculture journalism, said. "I appreciate the things we have here."

Sheep and dairy are New Zealand's two primary industries, Posler said. Sheep comprise the largest industry, with a ratio of three million people to about 69 million sheep. While in New Zealand, the group visited a slaughtering plant, went to a plant where wool products are made and to a milk processing plant.

The dairy operations in New Zealand, Posler said, are extremely efficient. What is commonly called a milking parlor in the United States is referred to as a rotary cow shed in New Zealand. The cows are pushed towards the shed by a motor-driven squeeze gate that one person operates at a control panel. The cows then walk onto a rotating platform where the milker is applied. Once it (the platform) has finished one revolution, the milking is finished. When the milk stops flowing, the released pressure causes the milker to come off.

"One milker could milk 150 to 200 cows in an hour and a half," Posler said.

The group also visited a hog operation while in New Zealand. The natives call them "piggeries," Posler said. The hogs there are in total confinement from farrow to finish. Like the dairy operations, the piggeries are extremely efficient. Bulk feed handling equipment is used similar to U.S. poultry operations.

Operations for wheat harvest were in full swing when the group visited Australia. Posler said harvesting there is done with a pull-type combine. The Australians call the process "stripping." Some of the larger farms use the self-propelled type combines, but most of the smaller farms use pull-types with eight- to 10-foot headers.

Posler said wheat in Australia is sold through a marketing pool, and farmers don't have a choice of selling wherever they want to. There is a set price, and they deliver their grain to a certain point.

"It's like a cooperative pool," Posler said.

Australian wheat yield is comparable to that of Kansas. Their best (yield) is about 50 bushels an acre, Posler said.

Australians grow primarily a soft wheat used for making crackers and cookies.

When it comes to planting the wheat, Australians plant the grain and apply the fertilizer at the same time by using a grain drill. They call this "combining," Posler said.

While the class was in Australia and New Zealand, they also saw a lot of horticultural-type crops.

Grenade explodes in mailbox

A grenade simulator interrupted activities early Monday night at the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity, 1919 Platt St., when it exploded in a mailbox, causing no apparent injuries.

Destroyed in the explosion was a hand-painted mailbox which had been given to the fraternity by its little sister organization, the Rho-Mates. A glass dome light and four pieces of mail also were damaged. A police report estimated the damage at $60.

Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department said there were no suspects in the case.

Members of the fraternity said they didn't know who might have placed the grenade simulator in the mailbox, although one member said that just before the explosion occurred he noticed a dark-colored car with two passengers circling the block.

Woodyard said the intent of the explosive was probably harassment, because of its being placed in the mailbox.

Commission reverses discrimination stance

By The Associated Press

HUNT VALLEY, Md. — The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, continuing to dismantle the liberal policies of its predecessor, approved a resolution Tuesday declaring that affirmative action quotas create a "new class of victims."

The panel, referring specifically to an affirmative action program for the Detroit police department, reversed the former commission's policy upholding quotas that allowed women and minorities to gain preference in hiring and promotion as a means of overcoming past discrimination.

In a 5-2 decision, the panel said that "such racial preferences merely constitute another form of unjustified discrimination, create a new class of victims, and when used in public employment offend the constitutional principle of equal protection of the law for all citizens."

The dissenters were Mary Frances Berry and Blandine Cardenas Ramirez, both of whom were members of the former commission that expired last year.

Under the Detroit plan, two separate lists are compiled for promotion from sergeant to lieutenant — one for blacks and one for whites. Promotions are made alternately from each list so that one black officer is promoted for each white officer. This policy will continue until 50 percent of the lieutenant corps is black, a quota expected to be attained by 1990.

Last week, the Supreme Court upheld the Detroit affirmative action plan, which had been challenged by five whites. The Reagan administration had supported the challengers' argument that the plan is an unconstitutional racial quota that discriminates against whites.

The commission said discriminatory employment practices should be stopped by enforcing the non-discrimination laws.

And, it said, any "identifiable individual" who has suffered discrimination should be "returned to the place he or she would have had in the work force in the absence of...discrimination."

At a press conference Tuesday, Berry attacked the independence of the commission's new majority, and said the panel is "no longer the conscience" of victims of discrimination. She said the commission has "become the twin of the civil rights division of the Justice Department."

But Commission Chairman Clarence M. Pendleton Jr. declared, "What we've done is declare our independence."

On Monday, the panel voted to study the adverse effects of affirmative action.

Senators oppose open records bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A House-passed bill aimed at fixing a flawed open records law passed last year met an unexpected challenge Tuesday from two senators who vowed to defeat it on the Senate floor after a committee washed its hands of the bill.

Sens. Jan Meyers, R-Overland Park, and Mike Johnston, D-Parsons, told their colleagues on the Senate Governmental Organization Committee they will oppose passage of the revised Kansas Open Records Act when it goes to the Senate floor today for debate and possible action because they believe it allows a state agency to sell mailing lists for commercial purposes.

"I think we ought to pass the bill as it was signed because we're doing a lot more than correct a computer error," Mrs. Meyers said after the meeting. "This is a massive policy change."

"Apparently there was a lot of confusion and misunderstanding among the people in the House who voted for this. It's an enormous policy change and a poor policy change. It's unethical and a terrible invasion of privacy and I will oppose it."

Meyers and Johnston objected to the committee sending the bill to the floor of the Senate without having "a full-blown hearing" and discussing the ramifications of changes in the proposal. They say the new version will result in a "terrible invasion of privacy" by allowing businesses to develop commercial mailing lists from state files.

However, Harley Duncan, secretary of the Department of Revenue, said it is not a question of making lists of names from motor vehicle files because his agency cannot deny anyone access to the files. He said the problem with the proposed open records re-write stems from wording that would allow commercial use of the lists.

Meyers said the Legislature is being deceived into thinking the change is minor and she charged the language being inserted into the current Open Records Act does much more than lawmakers are being told.

"A number of people want those records, there's a lot of money in mailing lists and they've tried to get them for a long time," Meyers said. She said the bill was being pushed "snuck through the back door" of the Legislature by "some immovable force that wants to sell those records." But she did not identify the "force."

"I'm sure you're saying in very good faith that all we're doing is correcting a computer error, when what we're doing is turn this bill upside down," Meyers told the committee. "I don't think it's appropriate to pass legislation under the guise of 'Gosh, we're just correcting a computer error,' when we're making a major policy change without benefit of a debate."

The Open Records Act which passed the 1983 Legislature was a sweeping revision of Kansas law requiring most government documents be opened to public inspection. However, part of a sentence in the bill was inadvertently omitted from the final version of the bill signed by Gov. John Carlin.

The dropped clause was part of a paragraph which prohibits agencies from selling records and documents such as mailing lists with names and addresses for commercial purposes.

Duncan told the committee he also opposed the Legislature's attempt to reinstate the dropped language because he believes it allows commercial use of driving records and lists by businesses. Under the wording of the present law, commercial use for mailing lists is a class C misdemeanor punishable by a $500 fine and a month in jail.

Freshman Thomas has goal for Lady 'Cats to 'win it all'

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

She dribbles through a group of defenders with the swiftness of guards much shorter than she. She leaps high for rebounds, displaying the leaping ability characteristic of centers who are much taller.

She is Carlisa Thomas, the K-State women's basketball team's 5-foot-10 guard who can head downcourt on a fast break just as easily as she battles basketball's tallest under the boards.

Thomas, who received her first starting job in December at the Guisti Tournament in Portland, Ore., starred in the Lady 'Cats' recent 92-71 win over Wichita State University. She canned 14 points and led both teams in rebounds with 10.

Not bad for a young freshman playing for the nation's ninth-ranked squad. But Thomas' play is no one-game surprise. She carries a long list of high school basketball credentials to prove that much can be expected from this Jacksonville, Fla., native.

An all-city, all-conference and all-state selection three times, Thomas also was picked for the second-team All-America squad by both Parade and Street and Smith magazines. She averaged 20.5 points, 18.3 rebounds and 14.8 assists in leading the Jean Ribault High School Trojanettes to the state tournament.

And it all began back in the parks of Jacksonville, said Thomas, who first took up basketball in the sixth grade. She continued practicing in parks and sharpening her skills in games with neighborhood boys.

Basketball camps and the influence of coaches followed next, helping lead naturally talented

Thomas to her successful high school statistics. Offers to play in the collegiate ranks came next, with far-away K-State winning the recruiting battle.

The academic philosophy of the Lady 'Cats' program was the major reason for choosing K-State, said Thomas, who finds the challenge of scholastics just as important as the challenge of basketball.

"A lot of the other colleges were talking to me just about basketball," she said. "K-State told me they wanted me to be a student first and play basketball second. They were about the only school that said they wanted me as a student and also a basketball player."

And what K-State wants, Thomas gives. So much, in fact, that she often finds the demands of both academics and athletics difficult to handle.

"It is very hard," she said. "All you want to do after practice is come in and go to bed. But you have to make yourself study and make yourself get up and go to classes."

According to Head Coach Lynn Hickey, Thomas is accomplishing both her requirements well.

"She's a really fine person," Hickey said. "She has a super attitude."

And when it comes to basketball, you'll find few with Thomas' talent — even with the expected freshman mistakes, Hickey said.

"She has great leaping ability and power," she said, "and we're trying to use all that effectively. She's going to be on the floor continuously, and that's really going to help her. She'll make so many things happen that it'll negate the mistakes."

One of those things happening includes Thomas' improved defense — a defense which held WSU leading scorer Lisa Hodgson to only eight points in the Lady 'Cats' last contest.

But her fine performance was simply a role requirement, said Thomas, who added that her basic role is to do whatever Hickey deems necessary in a particular game.

"My role is to go out on the floor and give my 110 percent," Thomas said. "Coach Hickey wants you to get better here and get better there. I think I will do a lot."

And what Thomas said she would ultimately like to do is land a spot on the Big Eight Conference team. Her natural ability in rebounding and passing helps, as well as the guidance of Hickey, she said.

"I had a lot to adjust to," Thomas said. "Coach Hickey expects a lot of you. I had come from a more running team, and she likes a more controlled game. I'm more under control because Coach Hickey is forever telling me to slow down. I've come to like it."

Thomas will start tonight in the Lady 'Cats' Big Eight opener against Oklahoma State University at Stillwater, Okla., in what she hopes will be a long string of victories for K-State.

"We have a really good team and have the talent to do anything we want," Thomas said. "Everyone has got to go out there and put their minds to it. I want to win it all."

If recent games and practices are an indication, K-State is in for exciting basketball from Thomas, Hickey said.

"I'm very proud of her and very pleased with her improvement," she said. "She's going to end up being one of the best players we've had at K-State."

Whether battling for a rebound or bringing the ball up the floor, Carlisa Thomas shows her talent on the basketball court.

K-State, OSU to tipoff Big Eight slate

Men need road win

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

The K-State men's basketball team will travel to Stillwater, Okla., tonight to square off against the Oklahoma State University Cowboys in a Big Eight conference opener for both squads.

The Cowboys are coming off an impressive offensive showing last Saturday evening, as they outlasted Texas-Arlington 106-99. Senior forward Raymond Crenshaw — one of only two returning OSU starters from last year's 24-7 team — burned the nets for a career-high 32 points and sophomore forward Joe Atkinson added 29 as the Cowboys raised their record to 8-5.

Tough defense was the key to the Wildcats' last victory as they knocked off the Southern Colorado, 59-44. The 'Cats limited the visiting Indians to 33 percent shooting while improving their record to 8-5.

On the Wildcat offensive end, senior forward Eddie Elder tossed in 18 points and grabbed 13 caroms while freshman center Alex Williams — in his second starting assignment — tossed in 15 tallies.

"We've been a little tentative offensively," said K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman, adding that the 'Cats need to be more aggressive towards looking for the basket.

Even though the 'Cats have averaged only 63 points in their last five games, they have won four of those — thanks to good defense. In those games, K-State opponents have made only 44 percent of their shots and have been held to 54 points per contest.

The Wildcats tangled with the Cowboys three times last season — twice in conference play and once in the Big Eight tournament — and the 'Cats came up short all three times. The closest K-State was able to come was 14 points, 75-61, in their final meeting.

This season OSU has been led by Atkinson and Crenshaw, who are averaging 19 and 18 points, respectively. Four of the five Cowpoke starters are shooting above 50 percent.

The 'Cats are led in scoring by Elder, who is tossing in 12.5 points each outing while bringing down eight boards per game. Forward Ben Mitchell and guard Jim Roder are averaging just over 11 tallies per game while connecting on well over 50 percent of their shots.

"We're making good selection of our shots, and we're taking our time," Hartman said. "We're shooting with confidence, and we're shooting to make it instead of shooting to get it out of our hands like we did last year."

The 'Cats and Cowboys have faced three common opponents. Both Big Eight squads topped the Centenary Gents and Wisconsin Badgers. K-State knocked off Oral Roberts by eight points in Ahearn, while Oklahoma State fell to the Titans by one in Tulsa, Okla.

"They are a good team that has to be dealt with," Hartman said.

Hartman is a 1950 graduate of Oklahoma State and carries a 21-9 record against his alma mater, including a 10-4 mark on the Cowboys' home court.

Three of K-State's first four conference games are on the road, with the lone home game in the stretch being Saturday afternoon against nationally-ranked University of Oklahoma.

Women hang tough

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

The tenth-ranked K-State women's basketball team will visit the campus of the Oklahoma State Cowgirls in Stillwater, Okla., tonight as both teams will get their first taste of Big Eight Conference action.

The Cowgirls nailed down the conference's cellar crown last season to go along with a 4-24 overall record, but following their Saturday night victory over Phillips University, this year's squad has already compiled a 9-4 record.

"Oklahoma State is a much improved team from last year," Lady 'Cat Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. The K-State women handled the Cowgirls quite easily in their three meetings last season.

Oklahoma State is led in scoring by junior center Kathy Schulz, who is averaging nearly 20 points per outing. Junior forward Jackie Glosson is hauling in just over eight rebounds per game to lead the conference.

Cowgirl Head Coach Dick Halterman — in his first season at OSU — is ready for the Lady 'Cats.

"This is one game we've talked about all year long," Halterman said. "It's one of those situations where it won't do us more good to lose by two or three points. If we're going to lose, I'd rather lose big. But if we're going to be in it, we need to win."

Halterman took the head coaching job after compiling a 144-21 record at Moberly Junior College in Moberly, Mo., in five years as the women's coach. In 1982 his team won the national junior college tournament.

Halterman brought five Moberly players — Glosson and Schulz included — with him to Oklahoma State.

Glosson was chosen as a Kodak All-American in 1983 and was picked by Champion Products as the women's "Junior College Player of the Year."

The Cowgirls have good experience and a solid bench, Halterman said.

The Lady 'Cats have had balanced scoring as four players — Tina Dixon, Jennifer Jones, Angie Bonner and Cassandra Jones — are each averaging over 10 points per game.

Because of an injury to Dixon and the departure of senior Barbara Gilmore for personal reasons, two freshmen will see more playing time for the Lady 'Cats.

Susan Green and Carlisa Thomas may start their third game of the year against OSU. Thomas led the team with 10 rebounds in the women's last victory, a 92-71 decision over Wichita State.

The Lady 'Cats, with an overall record of 10-3, have played a rugged non-conference schedule against nationally-ranked teams including Old Dominion University, the University of Texas and the University of Georgia.

"We did not win one of the big games — Texas, Georgia, Old Dominion," Hickey said, but she added that she was pleased overall with the way the women have performed.

"We're kind of having to start from scratch with Tina (Dixon) out, but at the same time, credit the talent we have for hanging together."

"Playing a tough non-conference schedule will help us in conference play. We have gained plenty of experience, and that will help us tremendously."

Wet those pants

I guess you could call me a sports fanatic, and I'd be the first to admit that the only part of the newspaper I usually read is the sports section. I've wondered if there is too big an emphasis on sports in my life and, if so, where it came from.

As a kid, sports were never forced on me; they just seemed like the thing to do.

To reminisce just a bit, I remember Dad saying, "Let's go down and sign you up for football," and off we went.

I was strapped into my first pair of shoulder pads and buckled on my first chin strap when I was seven years old, and became a member of the Langley Park Eagles 60-pound team. Being one of the "bigger kids," at 64 pounds, I was immediately thrust into the offensive line.

I have two vivid memories of my initial gridiron season. One is that my helmet was so tight that I could never take it off without almost ripping my ears off. So, at halftimes of our games, while everyone else would remove their helmets and get a cup of water from the cooler, I'd run around until I found a water fountain and shoot the water through my face mask into my mouth.

My other recollection is standing in front of the mirror on team photo day and messing up my hair so I'd look like my idol Chris Hanburger, a linebacker for the Redskins. But mom caught me, wet my hair and combed it straight back. I cried. I looked like actor William Hurt.

As I grew older and continued to participate in athletics, I think I experienced everything that could happen to a young jock: wetting my pants in the outfield, catching a fly ball with my lips and jumping up and down in the outfield because I was ready to wet my pants.

At the time, those incidents were

HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

embarrassing, but looking back I wouldn't have changed a thing. I have nothing against musicians, but how many cello players have grown up with exciting stories like those?

I've quit participating in sports, but I'll never quit enjoying them. It really bugs me when I read articles saying there is too much of an emphasis on sports in high schools. Too much! That's nonsense. There's not enough.

When I look back, I remember the times when the teams I played on were victorious, the honors I won and the times I performed exceedingly well. But my fondest memories are just the plain-old good times I had: traveling to other towns, hanging out with the guys and getting tossed out of motels for being too rowdy. I remember the interesting people I met by traveling to other towns: older couples who would take two or three of us players into their homes for a weekend, players on other teams and, of course, the girls.

There's more to life than sports, but by taking away a kid's opportunity to experience the good times that go along with participating, everyone ends up a loser.

Now, where is my baseball glove and the nearest restroom?

North Carolina tops college poll

By The Associated Press

For the first time this season, North Carolina's unbeaten Tar Heels were the unanimous choice as the No. 1 college basketball team in the weekly Associated Press poll announced Tuesday.

The Tar Heels improved their record to 12-0 with Atlantic Coast Conference victories last week, while Kentucky suffered its first loss by 19 points to Auburn.

As a result, North Carolina received all 62 first-place votes and 1,240 points from the nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Unbeaten DePaul, 13-0, took over the second spot with 1,160 points.

Kentucky, 12-1, dropped to third with 1,074 points.

Houston, 16-2, advanced from seventh to fourth place, while unbeaten Texas-El Paso, 15-0, moved from eighth to fifth place.

Georgetown, 13-2, which was upset by Big East rival Villanova 65-63 in double overtime, fell two spots to sixth, while Maryland, 11-2, also dropped two notches to seventh.

Nevada-Las Vegas, 14-1, made a big leap from 14th to eighth, while UCLA, 10-2, which was upset by Oregon 62-51 in a Pacific-10 game, plummeted three places to the ninth spot.

Illinois, 12-2, which lost to Indiana in overtime 73-68, but beat Ohio State 55-53, dropped one spot to 10th. Tulsa, 15-0, the only other undefeated Division I team, made the jump from 20th to 13th.

The second 10, in order, consisted of Oregon State, Wake Forest, Tulsa, St. John's, Louisiana State, Boston College, Fresno State, Memphis State, Purdue and Oklahoma.

Senator to alter image during campaign

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, one of the state's most popular politicians, sees her campaign for re-election this year as a forum to show people she is much more than "nice little Nancy from Kansas," an image from her early Senate days which she has striven to shed.

She doesn't plan to spend nearly as much money to win a second six-year term as she did in 1978, when her expenditures totaled $800,000 to win a nine-person Republican primary election and defeat Democrat Bill Roy, a former U.S. representative, to claim the seat vacated by James B. Pearson.

However, she will spend enough for a media campaign which "explains what I've been doing and what I plan to do," she said in an interview shortly before leaving for Stockholm, Sweden, where this week she is attending the European security conference with Secretary of State George Shultz.

For sentimental reasons, Kassebaum won't formally declare her intention to seek re-election when Republicans gather here the weekend of Jan. 28-29 for their annual Kansas Day observance. She plans to wait until late March for her official announcement.

"I plan to do it on the first day of spring," she said, saying it likely will come on the last weekend in March. The reason for the timing is she announced her bid for the GOP nomination six years ago on the first day of spring.

To date, she has only one declared opponent — Democrat James Maher of Overland Park.

Democrats say they do not expect any major challenge to Kassebaum's re-election, but she says diplomatically, "You never know what turn of events might bring. Anybody in an election would regard any competition as major, although there are some who are not as major as others, perhaps."

Maher has called Kassebaum "the den mother to El Salvador," a reference to her mission to that Central America nation at President Reagan's request two years ago to observe elections.

Others have disparaged her work in the Senate, while conceding her popularity with voters virtually assures her re-election.

Such assessments make her brittle, ever so slightly.

They are the reason she wants a re-election campaign which focuses attention on her accomplishments and the work she plans to complete in a second six-year term.

She also is letting it be known that she may seek a Republican leadership position for the 1985 session if Kansas' senior senator, Bob Dole, changes his mind and does not seek the majority leader's post to replace Howard Baker of Tennessee.

She said her work will be concentrated in four areas:

— The Senate Budget Committee, which she called "some of the most important work we have for the future." The committee deals with the broad format of the federal budget.

"I think we can see a reasonable budget, with deficits in the $30 billion to $60 billion range," she said. "I don't know that we'll see a balanced budget, but I think we can see reasonable deficits."

— Military reform, as chairman of the Senate Military Reform Caucus. It has succeeded in getting included in the Defense Department's budget an independent testing and evaluation division which would test military hardware before it went into production to iron out the bugs or demonstrate it should be scrapped, hopefully saving much money.

"It is an important, small first step," Sen. Kassebaum said. "The Department of Defense is still fighting it. They don't like having Congress telling them what they ought to do."

— Foreign aid, an area which she said has become very controversial because of the efforts of her and other senators to bring some order out of the way this country throws money into foreign aid.

"I do believe there are ways we can strengthen our defense posture not just by spending money but by spending it so we know we get our money's worth," she said.

— Assisting the Reagan administration in developing an arms control policy — "how we can curtail the escalating nuclear armament race around the world." Kassebaum co-sponsored a resolution to halt test flights of missile systems which failed by just nine votes in the Senate and foresees a renewed effort.

"I don't support a nuclear freeze, but I do very strongly support a policy to reduce the levels of weaponry," she said. Those who do such ratings report Kassebaum's support of Reagan has waned slightly over the three years he has been president, but she remains one of his strong backers while differing over women's rights, abortion and some foreign affairs issues.

"I've differed with him mostly on social issues, I suppose," she said. "What I try to do is vote with the party on procedural issues. I think that's where it's important to main-

Film industry objects to TV video recorder use

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a major legal setback for the film industry, a divided Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that the sale and use of home video recorders to tape TV shows for later, private viewing is legal.

The court voted 5-4 that the Sony Corp. and other makers are not violating U.S. copyright law by selling the popular machines, which the industry estimates are owned by about one of every 10 American families. U.S. sales of the recorders total nearly $2 billion.

The high court may not have the last word, however, in the high-stakes battle over video recorders. Movie producers are seeking a final victory in Congress, which has the power to rewrite copyright laws, and the court said "it may well be that Congress will take a fresh look at this new technology."

The justices said manufacturers may not be held responsible for possible illegal use of the video recorders, such as taping copyrighted productions for commercial profit.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in his opinion for the court, wrote that there is another remedy for this so-called "armchair piracy."

Stevens noted that anyone who reproduces copyrighted material for private financial gain — a federal offense — can be sentenced to one year in prison and fined $25,000 for the first violation. The penalty is two years and $50,000 for repeat offenders.

But Stevens said that taping television shows, even copyrighted ones, for private viewing at a later time is not illegal.

"One may search the Copyright Act in vain for any sign that the elected representatives of the millions of people who watch television every day have made it unlawful to copy a program for later viewing at home," he said.

"It may well be that Congress will take a fresh look at this new technology...but it is not our job to apply laws that have not yet been written," Stevens said.

An underlying question in Tuesday's ruling was whether Sony and other manufacturers could be forced to pay royalties to movie companies for making a machine capable of being used to break the copyright law.

The video recording industry said that if the court's opinion had gone against it, consumers might have had to pay a royalty, or tax, of $100 on each machine and $1 on each blank tape. The cost of the machines now ranges between about $400 and $800 each.

About 9 million of the machines have been sold in the United States, and the industry expects 40 million recorders to be sold by 1990.

The Supreme Court overturned a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in 1981 which said Sony was violating federal copyright law in selling machines that could only be used to violate that law.

The circuit court ruling prompted a spate of political cartoons featuring "video police" invading private homes to seize video recorders and arrest viewers.

The movie companies did seek a court order aimed at halting further sales of the machines. But both sides in the dispute said the real issue was whether the moviemakers would be able to share in the huge profits from sale of the machines and blank videotapes.

Sony Corp., the leader in the video recording industry, was sued in 1976 by Universal City Studios and Walt Disney Productions.

The movie companies charged that consumers were not using the machines merely to tape copyrighted shows for later family or individual viewing, but that many also were building videotape "libraries."

The producers predicted that movie box-office profits would decline as owners of the recording devices and their friends had more opportunities to view taped movies at home.

The recorder industry countered that the motion picture companies already made a profit, as well as condoning free home viewing of movies, when they sold broadcast rights for the movies to television. In a dissenting opinion, Justice Harry A. Blackmun said there would be little incentive for Congress to overturn the court's ruling.

Rep. Robert W. Kastenmeier, D-Wis., chairman of a House Judiciary subcommittee that is looking into the matter, said he doubted Congress would penalize viewers for taping television shows.

Rep. Michael DeWine, R-Ohio, a member of the Kastenmeier subcommittee, agreed. "It's going to be much more difficult and unlikely that Congress will want to do anything to impose a royalty fee on equipment," DeWine said.

But Rep. Don Edwards, D-Calif., said he would pursue his proposal to force manufacturers and importers of video recorders and tapes to pay a royalty to be split among copyright owners. Without such a royalty to movie producers, he said, consumers "will have fewer programs and programs of lesser quality."

Blackmun said the remedy is to allow motion picture companies to get a share of the profits from "time-shifting," or using the machines to record shows for later viewing.

"Because time-shifting of the studios' copyrighted works involves the copying of them, the studios are entitled to share in the benefits of that new market," Blackmun said.

His dissent was joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall, Lewis F. Powell and William H. Rehnquist. Besides Stevens, the court majority included Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justices William J. Brennan, Byron R. White and Sandra Day O'Connor.

The high court has been preoccupied with the Sony case for more than a year. It heard arguments in the dispute during the court term that ended last July, but it issued no ruling and gave no reason for postponing its decision until this term. The justices heard additional arguments in the case in October.

tain cohesiveness in the party. But I do feel you have to vote as you feel best on a given issue. I think we are sent to represent our constituents and to try to do what we feel is right."

She is adamant on two points about which people frequently question her: She will not remain in the Senate beyond the second term, a total of 12 years, and she sees little or no possibility she would become the Republican nominee for vice president, or president.

"I'm going to say what I've said from the beginning, and that is that this is my last campaign for the Senate," she said.

"There could easily be a woman president, so why do they always ask about the first woman vice president?"

"It's not for me. I enjoy the challenge of the Senate."

"Besides, I don't see it in the cards. I don't believe there will be a nominee who will ask me. Reagan wants Vice President (George) Bush and I agree. We need continuity in that office. It's very important to us right now."

Bison, farmers clash on Alaska Range

By The Associated Press

DELTA JUNCTION, Alaska — Bison, brown-bearded remnants of the frontier's wide open spaces, have made themselves at home on the doorstep of the rugged Alaska Range for more than half a century.

But today their presence is a source of constant conflict between game managers trying to preserve one of the nation's last free-roaming buffalo herds and farmers trying to grow barley and other crops in a wilderness area near the Arctic Circle.

On Thursday, a farmer accused of illegally killing three bison is due to go on trial.

Bison have roamed the area since two dozen of the animals were transplanted from Montana more than 50 years ago. The herd now numbers 300-400.

In the 1970s, Gov. Jay Hammond selected the area as the site for an ambitious state-sponsored, 60,000-acre development program, the Delta Agricultural Project, where barley fields would thrive in the midnight sun.

The unofficial dividing line between the buffalos and farmers has been the Alaska Highway, with state officials hoping the buffalos would stay south of the highway, away from the farmers' fields to the north. But the animals have crossed the highway to forage.

On Sept. 21, Earl Mitchell summoned Alaska State Troopers to his farm on the west bank of the Gerstle River. He told them he'd shot three bison, and invoked a state regulation which permits killing game animals "in defense of life or property."

When investigators arrived, Mitchell was salvaging the animals as required by the "defense" regulation. The meat was donated to churches.

But the regulation lists several criteria to be met before a game animal can be killed legally. Investigators said Mitchell had not exhausted "all other practicable means" to get rid of the animals before killing them.

A year earlier, Mitchell shot a buffalo on his farm. He pleaded guilty to the illegal killing, was fined $1,000 with $500 suspended, and given a suspended 10-day jail sentence.

Since Mitchell was cited, farmers, businessmen and sportsmen have been meeting to devise a solution — an alternative bison range. Earlier this month state Sen. Pappy Moss asked for $1.75 million to pay for it.

By clearing more black spruce, planting more barley and grass and fencing the north side of the highway, proponents of the plan think the bison can be pretty well contained.

Biologist Dave Johnson of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game said it's the closest thing to a consensus he's seen since he's been in Delta.

Responsible for protecting both the bison and the farmers' fields, Johnson has been catching it from all sides since he took the job in 1981.

"It's been a really tense situation," he said. "If we can just convince the people who make the decisions that there are real, live people out here who are being hurt by this, we can solve this problem. We can have both free-roaming bison and agricultural development."

That was the plan when the barley project first was conceived, but Johnson said it "fell through the cracks." There's never been enough money to develop the alternative range effectively, he said.

From April or May until August, most of the bison graze west of the Delta River, Johnson said. But forage is limited, and about the time it runs out, the animals migrate toward their winter range.

Unfortunately, that coincides with the ripening of the barley and hay crops in the agricultural project. With a short growing season, everything has to go right for farmers to harvest their crops anyway.

By developing the state range, which lies along the migration route, Johnson and the others hope to keep the bison south of the highway during critical harvest weeks.

But hamstrung by a lack of money, game managers cleared and planted only 75 acres in 1980. In 1981, the acreage doubled, and a few bison took advantage of it. In 1982, they spent perhaps one-third of the critical period there. By last fall, the range had grown to 600 acres — about half of it cultivated — and most of the herd lingered until forage dwindled in late September.

But last summer was abnormally wet and farmers still were trying to harvest in early October. Nevertheless, Johnson said the experience proves the alternative will work.

Ultimately, he wants to clear and plant 4,400 acres, and burn another 5,000 to 10,000 acres where nature will restock the bison's larder.

State amends charge in husband's slaying

By The Associated Press

JUNCTION CITY — A 30-year-old Emporia woman waived her preliminary hearing Monday in Geary County District Court after a conspiracy charge in her husband's shooting death was reduced to an amended charge of criminal solicitation of murder.

Lorna Anderson, 30, was charged originally with conspiracy to commit first-degree murder in the November death of her husband, Martin Anderson, 34. She was bound over for arraignment Jan. 25 and is free on $50,000 bond.

Geary County District Attorney Steve Opat said the reduced charge was not the result of a plea bargain but was consistent with the court's ruling in the preliminary hearing last week of Daniel Carter. Charges against Carter were reduced from conspiracy to commit murder to criminal solicitation.

Opat said the state has the option to file a higher charge in the future if evidence warrants it.

Gregory Curry, 20, has pleaded guilty to criminal solicitation and was the major witness at Carter's hearing. No one has been charged with murder in Anderson's slaying.

Anderson was shot three times in the head on Kansas 177 about 15 miles south of Manhattan in northeast Geary County.

His wife told authorities they stopped along the highway because she was ill. A man then shot her husband and took his wallet, she said.

U.S.-Soviet relations progress at conference

By The Associated Press

Stockholm, Sweden — Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko delivered a blistering attack on U.S. policies Wednesday, but in a private meeting later he and Secretary of State George P. Shultz appeared to make headway toward better relations.

A U.S. official said Shultz and Gromyko shook hands before and after their meeting and "were even smiling" afterward.

It was the first two-level contact between the superpowers since U.S.-Soviet arms talks broke off in November. The U.S. official called the discussion "good" and progress was made on many issues.

There was no word of a follow-up session but the official, who asked for anonymity, said only "future contacts were addressed."

In his address to the 35-nation European Disarmament Conference, Gromyko accused the United States of making "maniacal plans" for nuclear war. He said, "New missiles, bombers and aircraft carriers are being churned out in some kind of pathological obsession."

Asked about Gromyko's address, the U.S. official said Shultz "recognized it was a speech, but he took his normal, constructive attitude toward doing business with a foreign minister."

The meeting at the Soviet Embassy lasted five hours and 10 minutes — two hours more than expected.

Schultz then phoned a report to President Reagan, who joined with him this week in urging the Soviets to seek reconciliation after several months of deadlocked negotiations and public recriminations.

The U.S. official said the talks covered the state of arms control, security issues, human rights, Central America and regional and bilateral questions, but he gave no details.

On Tuesday, administration sources said Shultz would suggest that U.S.-Soviet arms talks resume on some level even if formal negotiations remain stalled.

The Soviet Embassy refused to discuss the meeting.

In his address to the conference, Gromyko made it clear Moscow would not return to the Geneva talks on intermediate-range nuclear missiles so long as NATO continues to deploy U.S. cruise and Pershing IIs in Western Europe. He charged that "at present the aggressive foreign policy of the United States is the main threat to peace."

Delegates to the 35-nation conference privately discussed Gromyko's hard-line speech but few would comment until they could study it.

Gromyko said the Soviet Union has "always advocated political dialogue between the East and the West and (has) no intention of giving it up in the future."

And he posed several proposals for the conference to prevent nuclear war and to ease tensions. They included a treaty on the "mutual non-use of military force," a ban on first use of nuclear arms, nuclear-free

University's witnesses testify in dismissal case

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

Although Ben Mahaffey had been given no merit pay increase earlier in his years at K-State, it was not until after the settlement of a lawsuit he had filed against several University administrators that dismissal action was considered by the University, testified David Mugler, associate dean of instruction in the College of Agriculture, Wednesday during the second day of the appeal hearing of the suspension and recommended dismissal of Mahaffey.

Mahaffey's attorney, David Schauer, questioned Mugler about the timing of the firing. Mugler said he was not certain, but it was "probably the case" that the University waited on the outcome of the civil suit before firing Mahaffey.

"There was discussion following the suit, but there was also discussion before," Mugler said. Ironically, Mahaffey received a 3 percent merit pay increase just before he was fired.

Witnesses are still being called by the University, with cross examination by Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry. Schauer elected Tuesday to have the University present its case first before he presents Mahaffey's.

Mahaffey filed the lawsuit in September 1981 and settled in May 1983 when Federal District Judge Patrick Kelly dismissed the case. Mahaffey had named the Board of Regents, President Duane Acker, Provost Owen Koeppel and various other University officials in the case.

Mahaffey filed the suit for infringement upon his constitutional rights of freedom of speech and due process, a breach of contract and outrageous behavior within the department. Kelly ruled against Mahaffey on the constitutional charges and refused to hear the other two charges because of a lack of jurisdiction.

Mugler testified he had met with three women students on Dec. 18, 1981, who were "concerned about the steady flow of derogatory comments about women" which Mahaffey made on a daily basis. Mugler reported the students said Mahaffey had said in class that women were emotionally insecure and they should pursue computer jobs or jobs with airlines.

In 1981, after Mahaffey had filed his third grievance with Faculty Senate over unfair teaching evaluations, Mugler said he had received more complaints about Mahaffey than any other faculty member in the College of Agriculture.

When asked if he thought Mahaffey's presence in the Department of Forestry was causing a loss of enrollment, Mugler replied, "I've had students who've told me they've changed majors because of confrontations with Dr. Mahaffey."

Thomas Warner, head of the Department of Horticulture and Forestry at South Dakota State University, testified he left K-State because of Mahaffey. Warner was an associate professor of forestry and program leader of the natural resource management curriculum until the end of December 1983.

"Part of the reason I left Kansas State was because of Dr. Mahaffey — a very strong part," Warner said.

Warner replaced Mahaffey as program leader in February 1979 and from then on the relationship between the two deteriorated, Warner said. Once, he said, he asked Mahaffey to help him draw up plans for a graduate program in natural resource management, but Mahaffey refused to help.

"The bottom line was that it was a confrontation. I was very careful in my phrasing and asked him that if I, as program leader, asked him to help, would he?" he said. "His reply was, 'You can kiss my ass because I won't do anything you ask.'"

Mahaffey's evaluation for 1979 ranked from excellent in professional service, Warner said, to fair in interpersonal relationships and poor in cooperativeness. Of all the department faculty, Mahaffey rated "the lowest of anyone in teaching in the department," he said.

"He disagreed. He was very vociferous and wouldn't accept any of my comments on his performance. He thought he had been very successful in his work that year."

"I felt he wasn't, and I still feel that way," Warner said.

Warner also commented about Mahaffey's sexist remarks, saying, "A number of female students had come into my office and voiced complaints that Dr. Mahaffey said women didn't belong in the field (natural resource management)."

Warner also said students had told him they would rather leave the program instead of taking more classes from Mahaffey.

Ed Nilson, a natural resource management graduate in 1978 who took four classes taught by Mahaffey, testified that one of those classes had become more of an "inquisition format" with Mahaffey preaching personal biases. Once, while reviewing a test, Nilson said, Mahaffey singled out a woman student, and by the end of class had her in tears with answers to her questions about her grade.

Nilson said he told Mahaffey then that he was being very unprofessional, to which the teacher replied, "One more word out of you and you're out." After class, Nilson discussed the matter with Mugler and Harold Gallaher, then head of the forestry department.

"I told them that in my time at Kansas State University, I had never seen a more sad example of a professor losing his professional competency," Nilson said.

Two gunmen kill school official at Beirut campus

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Two men with a silencer-equipped pistol killed the president of the American University of Beirut in the hallway outside his campus office Wednesday. The coroner said Malcolm Kerr died instantly from a bullet in the head.

An anonymous caller said a pro-Iranian group called Jihad Islami, or Islamic Holy War, was responsible for the slaying. The caller demanded anew that U.S. and French troops in the multinational force leave Lebanon "or we will shake the earth under their feet."

U.S. special Middle East envoy Donald Rumsfeld arrived from Israel shortly afterward and met for five hours with President Amin Gemayel. State radio said they discussed ways of easing tensions in Lebanon.

In Washington, President Reagan said, "Dr. Kerr's untimely and tragic death at the hands of these despicable assassins must strengthen our resolve not to give in to acts of terrorists."

Kerr, 52, a Beirut-born American known as an expert in Middle Eastern affairs, was shot at 9:10 a.m. (2:10 a.m. EST).

Witnesses said they did not hear the shots, but only the sound of Kerr's books, briefcase and umbrella hitting the floor.

Coroner Dr. Ahmed Harati said a 7.65mm bullet pierced Kerr's head from the right temple and exited just above the left ear, causing a massive brain hemorrhage.

Police said two young men carried out the killing and raced down three flights of stairs to escape.

Army troops sealed off the 73-acre campus, but no arrests were made. Classes were cancelled until Monday.

The bespectacled, gray-haired professor was the university's ninth president and took over in September 1982 while his predecessor, David Dodge, was in the hands of pro-Iranian kidnappers. Dodge was freed July 21 after a year.

Friends of the Kerr family in Cairo, where Kerr once taught, said Dodge, after his release, urged Kerr to get out of Beirut. Dodge, now in the United States, declined to comment publicly on the slaying, his wife said.

Kerr's ties with American University went back to his childhood. He was born in Beirut on Oct. 8, 1931. His father was a professor of biochemistry at the university's medical school. His mother was the dean of women students. Both were Americans.

His interest — or "passion" as he put it — was political science, with emphasis on the Middle East. He was an internationally recognized expert on Middle Eastern af-

Supreme Court decision opens jury proceedings

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The public and news reporters have a constitutional right to attend jury selection proceedings in criminal trials, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously Wednesday.

The court said trial judges may conduct secret jury selection only as a last resort, and only after listing specific reasons why such steps are necessary.

And when such closures take place, the court said, transcripts of the proceedings must often be made public.

The decision set aside rulings that have allowed California courts routinely to conduct secret jury selections in capital murder cases. The decision also extended a landmark 1980 Supreme Court ruling that the public and press have a right to attend criminal trials even when defendants object.

"The presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential," Chief Justice Warren E. Burger wrote for the court.

"The interest is to be articulated (by a trial judge) along with findings specific enough that a reviewing court can determine whether the closure order was properly entered," he said.

Before Wednesday's decision, there was confusion in lower courts over whether jury selection was to be considered part of a trial or a pretrial event.

In 1979, the high court ruled that a defendant's right to a public trial does not give the public and press any right to attend pretrial proceedings.

"The most important message this case sends is that there's a 9-0 consensus on the Supreme Court that trial judges must begin with the presumption of openness," said Bruce Sanford, a Washington lawyer.

Senator contests state apportionment

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State Sen. Norman E. Gaar and three of his legal colleagues announced Wednesday they will appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court a ruling by a three-judge federal panel that upheld Kansas' present legislative apportionment.

Gaar said in a public statement that neither he nor legal experts he has consulted outside Kansas can understand the basis for the three-judge panel's conclusions in the late December ruling.

The court upheld the state's 1979 apportionment of the 165 Senate and House districts, which was based upon since-abandoned state census figures. The judges refused to order redistricting for the 1984 elections.

However, the panel put the Legislature on warning that it had to change the method of drawing the legislative districts before it does it again in 1989. The three judges were James Logan of Olathe, a member of the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver, and District Court Judges Earl O'Connor of Kansas City, Kan., and Richard Rogers of Topeka.

"This decision brought both satisfaction and disappointment to the plaintiffs, and also a great deal of consternation in attempting to understand it," said Gaar's statement.

"We felt certain the system of reapportionment would fail the constitutional test, but we also felt the court should order reapportionment in time for the 1984 elections. But it did not."

"Consequently, again, comments from legal experts outside of Kansas were sought and, without exception, the commentators did not understand the court's decision..."

The attorneys who handled the challenge of the legislative apportionment on behalf of five voters said their conclusion is that "the decision seems to raise more questions than it answers." They also said that the issue must be decided by the U.S. Supreme Court because it affects legislative apportionment not only in Kansas but in all the states.

Patrick said Wednesday the appeal will be filed in the next several days. The Supreme Court must then decide whether it will even consider the case.

Third-floor Boyd residents plead for new locks

Third-floor residents of Boyd Hall continue to show concern regarding the replacement of locks on their room doors after Shelly McNaughton, senior in radio-television and resident assistant on the floor, lost her hall keys Dec. 10.

McNaughton was fired Dec. 16. Some of the residents living on the floor have informed Lisa Mays, graduate in guidance education and director of Boyd, about their desire to have the locks replaced, Lynn Bingham, freshman in engineering and a third-floor resident, said.

Bingham expressed concern about the possibility of someone finding the keys and having access to the rooms.

"It's almost scary knowing people can get into the rooms," she said.

As of Monday, the locks on the third floor room doors had not been replaced, and Bingham said she questions why the Department of Housing hasn't yet replaced the locks.

"I think it's ridiculous that they've waited this long," she said. "I get the idea that they just want to let it (changing the locks) go."

Thomas Frith, director of housing, previously said that if the residents are concerned, they should tell the hall director, who could then take the problem to the housing department.

Mays would not comment on whether the residents had come to her for help with the problem.

Frith, when contacted Tuesday, said the new locks should be replaced soon.

"I can reassure them (residents) that we (housing) have ordered new locks," he said.

When asked how the department handles problems if a resident's property is in danger, Rosanne Proite, assistant director of housing, said "each situation is handled differently."

Animal feed meetings to be held

The nutritional effects of various animal feeds and the importance of particle size in them will be the major topics for the 39th annual Kansas Formula Feed Conference, set for Jan. 23 and 24 at K-State. The conference is intended for individuals involved in feed manufacturing, animal science and animal nutrition. Speakers at the conference will include Cliff Baile, senior fellow with the Nutritional Chemicals Division of the Monsanto Company in St. Louis.

Another speaker will be Gary Cowman, research nutritionist with Trans Agri Corporation, Sandy, Utah, who will speak on hay preservation techniques.

Several K-State faculty will present papers at the conference. They will include Steve Pollman, who will present findings of his research on "Starter Pig Diet Composition," and Jim Morrill, who will explain his recent studies on early weaning of dairy calves.

Captain Kangaroo to visit K-State

Four nationally known experts, including the television personality known as "Captain Kangaroo," will be featured speakers at the fourth Governor's Conference on Education for Parenthood at K-State, March 15-17.

According to Stephen Bollman, director of the K-State Family Center and one of the conference planners, Bob Keeshan, creator and star of the "Captain Kangaroo" show, will speak March 17.

Bollman said more than 500 family service professionals, community volunteer leaders, parents and other individuals interested in education for parenthood are expected at the conference.

In addition to Keeshan, featured speakers include Betty Caldwell, president of the National Association for the Education of Young Children; Anthony P. Jurich, K-State specialist in adolescence; and Robert McCall, a child psychologist and author of "Infants: The New Knowledge about the Years from Birth to Three."

The conference also will provide nearly 70 separate workshops in five subject areas: infants and child development, adolescents, stress and children, family support networks and special populations.

Guest soloists to play in McCain

K-State will host two guest soloists in a performance at 8 p.m. Jan. 23 in the Chapel Auditorium.

Rita Knuesel, who plays alto saxophone, is chairman of the music department at St. John's University in Minnesota, said Al Cochran, instructor of music. Knuesel has performed at Carnegie Hall and in France, Germany, China, the Philippines and other countries. She was the first woman to receive the first prize in saxophone from the Paris Conservatory.

Robert Palmer, pianist, will assist Knuesel, Cochran said. He is a faculty member at Southwestern College, Winfield.

Admission for the concert is $2 for the general public. K-State students will be admitted free with student I.D.

fairs, lecturing and writing widely on the subject.

The killing was condemned by leaders of several Lebanese factions, including President Gemayel; his father Pierre Gemayel, leader of the rightist Christian Phalange Party; Nabih Berri, leader of the dominant Shiite Moslem militia Amal; and leftist Druse leader Walid Jumblatt, an AUB graduate.

Kerr had sought to keep the campus, generally viewed as an island of serenity in the strife-torn capital, free of political violence and to maintain its tradition for quality American-style education.

The killing came a day after gunmen kidnapped Saudi Arabian consul Hussein Abdullah Farrash in Moslem west Beirut.

The anonymous telephone caller for Islamic Holy War also said his group was responsible for the kidnapping. He said, "He is being tried according to Islamic law and we will soon throw out his body."

The caller, who spoke Arabic, phoned the Beirut office of the French news agency Agence France

Presse about four hours after Kerr's death.

Callers from the same group also have claimed several other attacks, including the Oct. 23 suicide truck-bombings at the U.S. and French military bases in Beirut. But proof of the group's existence has yet to emerge and one radical Shiite Moslem, Shiek Hussein Fadlallah, said, "This organization does not exist. It is a telephone organization."

Small business institute changes name, increases services

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

The Small Business Institute has increased its services and changed its name to the Small Business Development Center.

The SBI was an organization concerned with small business growth in the area and was operated through the College of Business Administration.

"The Small Business Institute became one phase in the whole project," Joseph Barton-Dobenin, professor of management, said, referring to the new program. SBDC was implemented Jan. 1 in cooperation with the Small Business Administration.

SBA, a non-profit organization concerned with small businesses in Kansas, has set up six other similar centers on campuses in the state.

The state headquarters for the SBDC is at Wichita State University.

"They tried to develop (expand) the good beginning of SBI to include the whole university system and offer support for small business operations," he said. Barton-Dobenin, father of the SBI, said the center will receive funding from the SBA.

"We will receive, for the next fiscal year, $25,000. It has to be matched by state funds," he said.

The SBI has offered free services for over 12 years to businesses within a 75-mile radius, he said. But the lack of funds has limited the service to counseling only.

The SBI offers counseling to small businesses in the fields of marketing, accounting, finance and management. Seniors in their respective majors work with the specific needs of the client.

"Generally, we try to fill the need of the small business person," Barton-Dobenin said. "I think it is a great opportunity for students to understand the problems of small business and apply what they learn in class."

Expanded services include short-term counseling, long-term counseling and training programs, he said. Funds are also available at his discretion for extra counseling outside of the center if necessary.

"A significant part of our mission is to provide training," Barton-Dobenin said. The classes consist of "people who want some more education in running a business."

Val Rohleder, owner of Pioneer Farm and Ranch Supply in Abilene, has used the SBI service for four years and has participated in programs offered by the center.

"This year I had an exceptional (student counseling) group, and they went overboard," Rohleder said. "We gave them a direction to go and then they did two other areas I didn't ask them to do. It has really helped my business."

The group ran surveys on the effectiveness of his advertising and aided him in other areas of marketing and accounting.

"It was good to get actual business experience and see how operations were run," Bob Kerr, senior in marketing, said. The group worked over 100 hours on the project for Rohleder last semester and received three credit hours for the work.

"We have already helped over 500 firms (using the SBI counseling)," Barton-Dobenin said. Twenty firms are scheduled for the SBI counseling this spring, along with several programs offered under the new arrangement, he said.

Professor creates company for class project

Collegian Reporter

Management skills are learned in conjunction with engineering technology through Entech, a student company operated through a K-State laboratory class.

Don Gilliland, assistant professor of engineering technology, operates his fabrication lab class as a company to allow his students to gain practical knowledge of how business functions.

When Gilliland began teaching the class in 1979, it consisted of six students and was a project class. The students were required to build something they were interested in and finance the project themselves.

The prerequisite for the course is Circuits I. This began to pose a problem in enrollment the second semester the course was offered because of the large number of students who wished to participate in Entech after completing the prerequisite.

"I didn't have enough time to trouble-shoot (supervise) all of the projects at the end of the semester because of the number of students enrolled," Gilliland said.

He then decided to form a company from the class. The "company" includes a president, accounting agent, fabrication project manager, project engineer, test group (more experienced students) and a support group.

The company works on a single project which is selected by Gilliland.

"I choose projects in which the product can be used by the Department of Engineering. Products which are needed by the department are usually not a first priority for their budget, so we make them ourselves," Gilliland said.

This semester the class is making automatic dialers, which have redial capabilities, to be used on department telephones.

"We try to finish the projects early in the semester so we can go through a 'burn in' period, and then we can evaluate them," he said.

Other products which have been completed by this class have been a power supply, logic designer, Eeprom memory programmer, modem (to use in transferring computer data over the phone line), capacitance meters and video monitors.

Gilliland said the logic designer has been the best design so far. Last fall's product, the video monitors, were the most difficult to fabricate. They were also dangerous if handled incorrectly.

"If a student would accidentally hit the tube neck, it could implode (burst inward before bursting out)," Gilliland said.

"Every project which has been attempted in this class has been completed successfully so far. We try to make all of the products competitive with similar products, but it is not always easy," he said.

Feasible designs are sought to teach students both efficiency and economics.

Students are required to order parts and form enclosures for each project.

"The phone bill is phenomenal. We have to order parts from across the United States, and it takes some effort to track down certain parts needed for each project," Gilliland said.

He said he encourages students to learn how to communicate with electronic manufacturers and distributors.

"In this class you encounter real life situations. I want my students to make mistakes here so they will learn from them. They will then be better qualified to enter their profession," he said.

He said he believes his students learn the most by bringing many technologies together when building their products. The technological skills taught in the class include working with computers, photography, mechanical, drafting and electronic skills and graphic arts (silk screen printing).

Writing skills are also stressed. With each project, an operating and service manual is required.

"These manuals are impressive if used in a job interview. They show the employer exactly what a student has been required to complete in the course," Gilliland said.

Students also have a chance to test management theories they have learned in other courses through their experience with Entech.

One problem Gilliland has encountered with students is that they are accustomed to having to compete for grades in other courses. In this course, however, they must join together and learn in a working environment.

Gilliland said students in the course have to earn their grade.

"I feel I do a better job in a lab situation. I also feel I have a way of criticizing constructively without offending my students," Gilliland said.

There are 31 students enrolled in the course this semester compared to 20 last semester. Gilliland said he thinks this number is too many, and foresees severe management problems in the large class size.

The laboratory is a taken by all electronic and computer engineering technologists. The course will soon be required to be taken twice, once as a member of the support group and the second time as a member of the test group.

Reagan's speech merely rhetoric

President Reagan is preparing for the 1984 election by representing U.S. foreign policy in a new light. In short, his speech Monday was "intended" to reassure the world that he is sincere about reducing the possibility of a nuclear war.

Reagan points to the buildup of U.S. conventional and nuclear firepower as a deterrent to war, therefore making the world a safer place to live. Reagan also justifies the buildup of the nuclear arsenal as a bargaining chip for U.S.-Soviet nuclear arms talks.

Reagan realizes that his image is hurting him both at home and abroad. By the content of his speech, it is obvious that he is aiming at two specific audiences — voters and Soviets.

Reagan hasn't changed his stance, just softened his harsh words toward the Soviets. He realizes that Americans are becoming increasingly uncomfortable with his "previous" rhetoric with the Soviets.

The Soviets have dismissed his speech as election year propaganda for the sole purpose of gaining votes. They have given up hope of trying to negotiate with the Reagan administration. His three years of condemning them has desensitized them.

Military actions around the world involving U.S. troops has shaken Americans and Soviets alike. The Grenada invasion, the deployment of troops into Lebanon and the increase of U.S. involvement in Central America has pointed to a White House that is willing to use force when negotiations fail.

The Soviets are unlikely to go to the nuclear arms bargaining table with the United States because they view the president as a hostile leader who refuses to negotiate a mutual agreement.

Reagan must now prove to the world, by words and action, that he is sincere about negotiating on the nuclear arms issue. He must start treating the Soviets with the respect a superpower demands. However, future respect may not be enough to heal severed U.S.-Soviet ties.

Fan support crucial for Wildcats

Robert Lipson may be right. Support for the Wildcats isn't what it used to be.

Ahearn Field House has a tradition of stands so packed students have resorted to hanging from the rafters to see the court. Due to ticket demands in recent years, fans camped out not only to buy tickets but to reserve places in line for each home game. But, seemingly without a passing thought, these days of basketball glory have disappeared.

Lipson, an ardent Wildcat supporter and general laborer, wrote a guest column in Monday's Collegian encouraging greater support of the men's basketball team. A follower of the squad since the early '70s, Lipson is dissatisfied with the University community's lackadaisical attitude towards the team this year.

While the Wildcats lack their old luster, sporting eight wins to go along with their five road losses, an absence of support will not improve the team's performance. The message the campus and city is sending to Hartman and his players — don't expect support unless you play well — is very negative. The sight of an only partially-filled Ahearn must be terribly sobering for the team, especially knowing Ahearn's size doesn't match any other basketball facility in the Big Eight Conference.

Many other factors could contribute to the drop in support this year, including high ticket prices. Or maybe this reflects the beginning of an attitude reversal, a renewed emphasis on academics. Growing support for the women's team, however, indicates the community follows a winner.

But the Wildcats need community support to be winners. Lipson said he believes the team has potential, and it is up to the fans to ensure a victory. He has a suggestion to boost the players' morale before they take on the University of Kansas Jayhawks at Lawrence Jan. 28. If the Wildcat fans would assemble at the southwest side of Allen Field House to greet the team as they arrive — about 2½ hours before the game, they could make a difference in the score, he said.

While only the truly devoted might follow up on Lipson's suggestion, others should remember that fan support of any kind inspires a team to win.

Salvadoran army lacks cause

Last week the Kissinger Commission gave its report on Central America. President Reagan called it "the most comprehensive review" he has seen on the problems that face the region. But, based on reports so far, it fails to recognize some fundamental concerns that many observers think are necessary for peace in the region, most immediately, for El Salvador:

- A reduction of arms being sent to the region.
- Elimination of the practice of right-wing death squads.
- Incorporation of the guerrilla forces into any peace settlement.

First, the commission rubber stamped the Pentagon's request to triple the military aid to El Salvador, to $200 million per year. The commission did recommend that the military aid be linked to evidence of improved human rights conditions. Reagan reiterated that this would not be necessary, but an improvement would be nice.

Monday, right on cue, the State Department issued a report praising the Salvadoran government for taking "unprecedented" steps to curb rightist death squads. They claimed that in the last six months only (only?) 624 civilians died at the hands of the rightists, as opposed to 1,020 the first six months of 1983.

These figures, it turns out, are the official Salvadoran government tallies. Americas Watch, an agency of the Roman Catholic Church, reports that the civilian deaths have actually risen from 2,527 to 2,615 over the same period. The Reagan administration appears quite willing to put this kind of evidence aside. They prefer instead the military's figures. (The military only stands to gain $400 million over two years.)

Secondly, the Reagan administration has yet to convince anybody that the so far unbeatable force in the revolution is coming from Cuba or Nicaragua. Yet the commission assigned those two the majority of the blame for the region's problems. Sure, the guerrillas have the support of those countries (as well as virtually every European country). But of cold, military hardware sufficient to beat a U.S.-equipped army, there is little evidence.

The administration has apparently stopped trying to show proof that all of the guerrillas' weapons are coming from Nicaragua. There are no common borders between El Salvador and Nicaragua, and the strip of Honduras that runs between them is well-patrolled. I would imagine that the U.S. government has a good idea of the amount of weapons being smuggled. But making the figures public would probably point out the unspeakable: The primary source of weapons for the "Marxist — Leninist" guerrillas is the U.S. taxpayer.

I have seen different estimates of the specific proportions, but it is generally accepted that well over half of the weapons used by the guerrillas are either stolen, captured or are bought from (our friends) the military officers. (My personal favorite, the latter is a case where Salvadoran soldiers cynically ex-exploit this country's fear of social revolution.)

DAN ROBISON

A more evident reason for the military losses is the well-documented lack of spirit among the government forces. There has been little indication that increased military aid has or will change the course of the conflict. U.S. military aid has gone from a few million to $65 million per year in the last three years and, if anything, the military is losing worse than ever.

This is not a subject you find either government admitting. But consider the report by Chris Hedges in the Jan. 9 Christian Science Monitor. Right after New Year's, the Salvadoran military suffered "its two worst defeats" to date. The first defeat was the takeover of the 4th Infantry Brigade headquarters at Paraiso. According to the Monitor, "The base was designed by U.S. counterinsurgency experts to prevent just such a surprise attack."

The second defeat, two days later, was the destruction of the 440-meter-long Cuscatlan bridge. This was apparently the only bridge connecting the "productive" eastern region with the rest of the country. The soldiers guarding the bridge were (naturally) ringing in the New Year. In addition, a sizable force in the area was contacted, and simply did not respond to calls for help from the bridge.

In both cases the government forces were beaten, not because they lacked weapons, but because they lacked the will to fight. By Jan. 9, the Salvadoran Defense Ministry still had not admitted the two defeats (confirmed by the Associated Press Jan. 16). Nor had they admitted that, "The bodies of at least 100 unidentified soldiers killed in the (first) attack were bulldozed into a mass grave in Chalatenango." The same reporter said, "The army was sighted in two western provinces pressing teenagers into the military at gunpoint."

After the events, a high-ranking Salvadoran military official was quoted by Hedges as saying, "We are losing the war. The only way to salvage the situation is to give the troops something to fight for. Until that time, we cannot be saved, no matter how much military aid arrives from the United States."

The common soldier in both armies was the peasant who worked in the fields so that the upper class might live in luxury. Why should they die that the old system be reinstated? This system of exploitation has been around virtually since the Spanish Conquest in the 1500s. Opposition did not begin with the Cuban Revolution or with the Soviet Revolution. Why should it end with a temporary return to the old "peace?"

In comparison with the military, the guerrillas offer promises (possible or not, Marxist or not) of real social change. The rebels are a group of people who have fought together and experimented with self-determination. They are organized, motivated and will never return to the old ways. The Kissinger Report specifically rules out negotiation with the rebels.

In many ways, the Commission report seems to be a reprint of the policy we've already had. We are getting the same food, with triple the bill.

Kissinger wrong about El Salvador

WASHINGTON — One of the enduring mysteries of Washington is why some men endure. The town is studded with people who were wrong on Vietnam, wrong on Cambodia, wrong on Lebanon, and who nevertheless get summoned repeatedly to advise the president. Among the "wrongest" of these has been Henry Kissinger. He is about to keep his record intact.

Kissinger has filed a dissent from the report of the commission that bears his name. A majority thinks military aid to El Salvador should be "conditional" on human rights progress. Kissinger, although "strongly" endorsing conditionality, added a quibble: human rights are important, but not as important as the strategic value of El Salvador.

Immediately, the White House sided with Kissinger. It said Ronald Reagan is "inclined" to ignore any recommendation that Salvadoran aid be linked to so trivial a matter as the murder and torture of civilians, although a spokesman later said the president would keep an open mind. Like Kissinger, though, the president is an exponent of first things first.

When it comes to a meeting of the minds, this is a Latin American version of the hat trick — Kissinger.

Reagan and the Salvadoran killers all in agreement. Nothing is as important to the Salvadoran right than the eradication of communism — a label it promiscuously applies to anything from the genuine article to mere dissent.

Whatever you might think of this policy, it is nothing if not familiar. As in Vietnam and Cambodia, the bloody flag of international, godless and ring-around-the-collar communism is waved to deflect us from the ugliness at hand. Since Ronald Reagan came to office, some 30,000 Salvadoran civilians have been murdered by right-wing death squads. And until recently the Reagan administration did not, as they say at the State Department, say squat. On the contrary, it sacked an ambassador who complained about the death squads and disavowed a second who did the same.

Now the administration is putting up a fuss and the Salvadorans, who know a charade when they see one, are going along. Three military officers implicated in death-squad activities have been dealt with — sent abroad as military attaches. Salvadoran justice can be brutal.

But with Kissinger saying that death squads are regrettable but something we may have to live with, and Reagan saying just about the same thing, there will be no impetus for the Salvadorans to reform. And if they do not do it now, they will certainly not do it later, if this latest war against communism is won. Then it will be only a matter of time until Salvador is in flames again. Nothing fertilizes the soil of revolution like the blood of martyrs.

All this escaped Kissinger, who sees almost everything but his recent appearance on "Dynasty" in East-West terms. He finds the Soviets under every bed and, to be fair, they are not above some meddling. But Salvador, indeed all of Central America, is a problem in and of itself and for all the talk of "exported" revolution, the civil wars there are indigenous.

The death squads, for instance, are illustrative of a society where the powerful oppress the weak with impunity, sharing nothing with them — not land, not opportunity, not education, not medical services, not even respect for human life. Any Soviet meddling under these circumstances would amount to gilding the lily. But aside from that, it is past time that the Soviet threat — alleged, actual or exaggerated — is trotted out to excuse every policy mistake (Lebanon) or to ignore murder (Salvador).

With El Salvador, Kissinger has told the Administration what it wanted to hear and enhanced his conservative credentials. Justice demands that he be rewarded with the high office he insists he does not want. But there is another kind of justice, and it insists that Salvadoran killers be dealt with. That's not only morally right, it's yeasty with Kissingerian pragmatism.

If history is any guide, Kissinger's morally obtuse policy will not only miscarry, but it will be forgotten when another president wants advice. When it comes to Kissinger, Washington is like Salvador. Nothing succeeds like failure.

Movie reveals other side of usually serious director

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

When director Martin Scorsese and Robert De Niro have teamed up in the past — "Raging Bull," "Taxi Driver," "Mean Streets," and "New York, New York," — the results were definitely not pleasant entertainment. These films grabbed their audiences by the scruff of the neck and threw them into a world occupied by desperate characters who hovered on the brink of sanity. With "The King Of Comedy," the opportunity that the situation has given him, Pupkin introduces himself and pleads to go on the Jerry Langford show as a guest to deliver a comedy monologue. Langford brushes him off by telling him to drop by his office to discuss it. Pupkin so earnestly wants to believe that Jerry was sincere with him that he struggles beyond all hope to get past the security surrounding Jerry's office. He is then physically thrown out of the television studio's lobby.

Review

Scorsese takes the audience on a trip to a similar type of brutal environment, but the results are altogether different.

"The King Of Comedy" is not the deadly serious work that we have come to expect from Scorsese; it takes a narrative perspective that is almost as bent as the lead character, Rupert Pupkin.

Pupkin thrives on the garishly colored streets of Los Angeles. He lives only with the hope of becoming famous enough that he can sit down on a talk show and make idle chat with movie stars. And the talk show he loves the most is the Jerry Langford show — a show very closely resembling Johnny Carson's Tonight Show.

In the film's opening scene, Pupkin saves Jerry Langford from being mobbed by overzealous fans. Taking advantage of "National Enquirer." This yearning for the behind-the-scenes glances which tell us about the private lives of the stars is the real impetus in "The King Of Comedy."

Paul Zimmerman's screenplay is full of brilliant satirical twists that echo the common man's view of success. These moments, bound to make the viewer squirm with feelings of uneasiness, are conveyed with such a savage wit that the effect is simply hilarious.

The focus of the screenplay is not so much upon the psychological demise of Pupkin, but upon the mechanics of the plot — and what a plot it is. Pupkin kidnaps Langford, ties him up with twenty rolls of masking tape, and for ransom, asks to be allowed a 10-minute monologue on the Jerry Langford Show. The plot is so outrageous that it passes beyond the normal bounds of credibility and ventures onto the razor edge between slapstick comedy and tragedy.

Robert De Niro gives a performance that perfectly realizes the manic rise of Rupert Pupkin. Sandra Bernhard, as Pupkin's sidekick, is very effective in her film debut. The scene when she strips before the bound and gagged Langford is one of the highlights of the film. The real gem in this film, though, may be the brilliantly controlled performance by Jerry Lewis as Jerry Langford. He gives his characteristic mugging only when the moment calls for it; otherwise he underplays his character with a very effective feel for the paranoia of the successful comedian.

City children learn computer math

Ten years ago it would have looked like a space-age classroom in a science fiction film. Today it looks like most elementary or junior high school classrooms throughout the nation.

The use of computers in elementary and secondary schools is becoming a fundamental part of education.

In the Manhattan school district, pilot programs are offered in several elementary schools. All 890 students at Manhattan Middle School are offered experience on computers, Cheryl Yunk, head of the math department, said.

The middle school began teaching with computers in summer 1981, Yunk said.

"They are used in the math department," she said.

"Students learn basic skills in a game format. Computers teach a concept in a more attractive, exciting way," she said.

In class, the students use software that has already been developed. Yunk said few students will learn programming.

According to Marie Green, adviser to the school's computer club, students interested in programming may join the computer club. She said 20 students meet twice a week — one day for lecture and another to practice what they learned.

"Some students have computers at home, while others have no experience," she said.

Beginning this week, the K-State Division of Continuing Education is offering two computer courses for youth beginning at the fifth-grade level. A second session will begin March 26.

"The courses are designed to give the children hands-on experience," Larry Pankratz, community activities coordinator, said.

One course will teach keyboarding, or typing skills, on the computer, he said. The other course is an introduction to computers.

"It will teach them the components of computers and basic processes, like turning it on. Basically, we want to show them what computers can do for you."

'Dynasty' stars inspire perfumes

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Actress Linda Evans says she's "thrilled and honored" at being the inspiration for a new perfume, although the fragrance for "Dynasty" co-star Joan Collins will be "a little more naughty."

Bob Miller, president of Charles of the Ritz Group Ltd., said his company will launch "a very high-quality product" later this year aimed at people who watch the popular ABC television series.

The perfume will sell for about $125 an ounce and the eau de toilette for $10 to $15.

The fragrances will be designed to reflect the personalities and character of the women on Dynasty, Miller announced Tuesday at a party at fashionable Chasen's restaurant.

Standing beside Evans, who stars as Krystle, Miller said, "Her essence will be warm, romantic, feminine and soft, yet carry a sense of independence."

On the other hand, the perfume for Alexis, played by Miss Collins, would be "a little more naughty," he said.

Evans said, "I'm thrilled and honored. It was so exciting to go through all those little blotters trying out all the essences. Never in my wildest dreams would I have thought I would be involved in inspiring a perfume."

Princess to experience ranch life

BLEIBLERVILLE, Texas — Princess Anne of Britain will get a closeup look at ranch life later this month, watching horses work with cattle and seeing embryos implanted into cows.

She will visit L.F. and Eleanor McCullom, whose spread is about 65 miles northwest of Houston, and another ranch on Jan. 27 during her tour of Houston, Galveston and New Orleans. McCullom is the retired board chairman of Continental Oil Co.

Helen Mann, information officer of the British Consulate in Houston, said the ranch visits will be private.

"The British consul general here mentioned that her royal highness was interested in seeing cutting horses work and new breeding techniques," Mrs. McCullom said. Cutting horses are trained to isolate a specific cow from a herd.

Mrs. McCullom said her husband owns the largest herd of Salers cattle in the United States and does his own embryo implants.

Princess Anne, a competitor in the equestrian events in the 1976 Olympics, is promoting the British Olympic effort during her trip.

Entertainers donate funds for van

LOS ANGELES — Donations from entertainers Joan Rivers and James Garner helped raise $3,000 to restore a specially equipped van that was stolen from a cerebral palsy victim last fall.

"Now I realize there are some nice people out there, generous people," John DiThommaso, 22, said after getting his van fixed. "It feels great," he said. "It's great that I can move around again."

The contributions will help meet monthly loan payments and help refurbish the vehicle, which was stripped of its radiator, headlights, battery, wheels, brake drums, tools and other equipment when police found it last November.

DiThommaso's only income is monthly Social Security benefits of $424.

His mother, Lucille DiThommaso, said the family received contributions totaling about $3,000, including $500 each from Rivers and Garner.

Menninger opposes changes in prison system

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Dr. Karl Menninger and Shawnee County District Judge William Carpenter were the key witnesses to testify before a House committee Wednesday on behalf of mental evaluations for prison inmates and to defend the mingling of men and women at two Kansas penal institutions.

The 90-year-old Menninger, co-founder and chairman of the board of the Menninger Foundation in Topeka, told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee it would be a mistake to splinter or eliminate the state Reception and Diagnostic Center in Topeka.

The committee took no action Wednesday and will not vote on the proposals until next week, Chairman Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, said.

The state center is for the diagnosis and evaluation of convicted felons before and after sentencing. Inmates from the Kansas State Penitentiary in Lansing, State Industrial Reformatory in Hutchinson and other prisons are brought in for mental evaluation and testing.

Menninger has been associated with the facility since its inception in the early 1960s and is a long-time champion of prison reform and inmate rehabilitation programs. He warned it would be difficult to find qualified personnel such as psychiatrists and psychologists to staff the programs if they are moved to Lansing or Hutchinson.

"There's no psychiatrist out there now because they can't find one," Menninger said. "If you break it up, it will multiply the problem of finding them."

"We've got a great thing going out there, although in shabby quarters. But you can do something about that."

He also said it would be expensive to establish teams of psychologists and doctors to perform evaluation work at each separate prison. Instead of decentralizing the center, Menninger said it should be expanded to perform research on inmates. Carpenter agreed with Menninger and said the reception and diagnostic center is extremely valuable to district court judges because evaluations provide vital information about felons and whether they can be given probation or are dangerous and need to be locked up.

"The diagnostic center has saved many of us from stepping on land mines quite a few times," Carpenter said. "We are very lucky in Kansas to have a place where we can get in-depth, informative evaluations."

"As judges, we've relied very heavily on those reports in making sentencing decisions. Not many states have a full diagnostic center and we'd hate to see you change an institution that has served us so well."

Besides the bill to eliminate the reception center, the committee is considering a proposal to prohibit the Department of Corrections from housing men and women inmates in the Kansas Correctional Institute at Lansing where some 35 men are incarcerated with about 175 women.

The KCIL facility came under fire during the summer from an interim committee which recommended the policy of co-correctional prisons be banned. The interim panel was upset after six pregnancies occurred among women imprisoned there.

Secretary of Corrections Michael Barbara sharply criticized the proposal saying the Legislature should not insert itself into the administrative and managerial side of executive branch operations.

"This is an issue that's been overblown more than it should be," Barbara told the committee. "It's an administrative problem of the Department of Corrections. It should be left to us. If I don't do the job, you can call me into the carpet or (Gov. John) Carlin can remove me."

Student Senate to determine fate of identification buttons

Student Senate will decide the fate of the "senate button" tonight at its 7 p.m. meeting in the Union Big Eight Room.

Lori Leu, senate chairman and senior in social sciences, said a bill to repeal a requirement for senators to wear senator identification buttons has been introduced by Kay Deever, senior in elementary education, Brian O'Neill, graduate in journalism and mass communications and Diane Johnson, senior in electrical engineering.

The original bill, which passed March 24, 1983, requires senators to wear a button bearing the word "senator" while on campus on days of senate meetings.

Since most students do not know who their elected representatives are, the bill was passed to help make senators more visible on campus, Leu said.

However, "the bill has not accomplished what it was set out to do," Johnson said.

Johnson said other means of getting student input are more effective. For example, next year's senate may introduce a visitations policy, she said.

Tina Rather, chairman of the Communications Committee and senior in pre-law, said only about 15 people voted for a visitations policy which was introduced to senate last semester.

"The two people who did approach me made wearing the button worth it to me, Rather said, "but only two people approached me all year."

Leu said the button question is the only bill on the agenda for the meeting tonight.

zones in Europe and a ban on chemical weapons in Europe.

Shultz and NATO had hoped Gromyko would give some indication of readiness to resume the talks. The Soviets walked out — as they had warned they would — Nov. 23 after the first cruise missiles arrived in Britain and the first Pershing IIs in West Germany.

Administration sources told The Associated Press Tuesday if the Soviets are reluctant to resume formal negotiations in Geneva, the United States is prepared to open other means of communication to reverse the arms buildup by the Soviets and the United States.

Gromyko also denounced U.S. actions in Lebanon and Grenada.

Referring to the multinational peacekeeping force in Beirut, including troops from the United States, France, Italy and Britain, he said: "Lebanon is trampled by the soldier's boot of some of those states whose representatives are seated in this (conference) hall....The U.S. war machine is sowing death and destruction there."

Cowboys gun down K-State to grab conference opener

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

Oklahoma State guard Winfred Case hit four free throws in the final 39 seconds to pace the Cowboys to a 60-58 win over K-State in the Big Eight opener for both schools Wednesday night at Stillwater.

Case's free throws ruined a K-State comeback in which the 'Cats fought back after being behind by as many as 10 points in the second half.

After a slam dunk by K-State freshman Alex Williams brought the 'Cats to within one, 56-55, Case drew a foul from sophomore guard Jim Roder and hit both ends of a one-and-one free throw opportunity to give the Cowboys a 58-55 lead.

Junior Tom Alfaro brought the 'Cats back to within a point, 58-57, with a baseline jumper. With seven seconds left, Case sank two charity shots after a foul by junior guard Eric Watson to ice the game for the Cowboys. Eddie Elder ended the scoring for the 'Cats, with the junior forward hitting the front end of a one-and-one after time had expired.

The first half was a see-saw affair. Although the Cowboys never trailed in the game, they couldn't put the 'Cats away when they opened a lead.

A jumper by Cowboy sophomore forward Joe Atkinson pushed OSU to its biggest lead of the first half, 20-14, with seven minutes remaining. The 'Cats clawed back to outscore the Cowboys 8-2, with an Alfaro shot tying the score, 22-22.

Oklahoma State took control in the last minutes of the half with an Atkinson free throw, pushing the Cowboy lead to 29-23 at halftime.

Atkinson was a dominating force on defense in the first half, blocking four K-State shots. The 'Cats shot only 33 percent in the opening half.

Oklahoma State grabbed a 10 point lead at the beginning of the second half, with Case and junior guard Bill Self each hitting two baskets. A jumper by senior forward Raymond Crenshaw gave the Cowboys a 39-29 lead.

Following a K-State time-out, the 'Cats regrouped to score eight unanswered points to pull within two, 39-37, with 13:28 to play.

An Alfaro jumper from long-range tied the score, 41-41, with 11:30 left. The two teams traded baskets until an Elder follow-shot again knotted the teams at 52 with 3:14 to go. Elder led K-State scorers with 16 points.

The 'Cats had two chances late in the game to take the lead, but failed to capitalize. Junior forward Lafayette Watkins missed the second free throw on a one-and-one situation with the score 54-53. Elder grabbed the rebound off the miss, but lost the ball to Crenshaw. On another opportunity, Roder stole a pass from the Cowboys, who were in a delay game, but turned the ball over on the offensive end.

The Cowboy's Crenshaw led all scorers with 18 points. Following Elder's 16 for K-State was Williams with 14 points, while Alfaro came off the bench to pitch in 12 points.

The 'Cats next face the Oklahoma Sooners at 2:10 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

Lady 'Cats score tough win

Led by four players with double-figure scores, the Lady 'Cat basketball squad grabbed a narrow 76-71 victory over the Oklahoma State Cowgirls Wednesday night at Stillwater, Okla.

The ninth-ranked Lady 'Cats, who improve overall to 11-3 and 1-0 in the Big Eight Conference race, maintained only a 73-71 lead with 19 seconds remaining in the contest. K-State held on for the five-point victory and led by as many as 15 points in the game.

Four of the Lady 'Cat starters reached double figures, with sophomore guard Cassandra Jones leading the way with 19 points. Sophomore Jennifer Jones followed with 15, while sophomore Sheronda Jenkins tossed in 13. Freshman Sue Leiding rounded out the double-figure attack with a career-high 12 points.

K-State, which shot 49 percent from the field and 63 percent from the free throw line, was led in the rebounding department by freshman Carlisa Thomas. The 5-foot-10 guard came off the bench to grab nine rebounds.

The Lady 'Cats next contest will be a home game Saturday against the University of Oklahoma at Ahearn Field House. The Sooners enter the contest with an impressive 12-1 record, winning the last 11 games in a row.

"As a whole, Oklahoma is shooting very well and are winning big," Head Coach Lynn Hickey said. "They have played many of the same teams we have and have beaten them by greater margins, (but) at this point they have not played any top twenty teams. We're hoping that our tough non-conference schedule will help us in these difficult conference games."

Rebound battle

The Breakers center Deb Rettele gets a hand on a rebound as Sherri Massey, left, and Kim Andra of the Lassies apply defensive pressure. The Breakers, three time defending intramural champions, won

Dickey signs six players

Jim Dickey, K-State head football coach, Tuesday announced the signing of six junior college players. The players already are on campus and will participate in spring drills.

Two of the signees are from Northeastern Oklahoma Junior College in Miami, Okla. They are receiver Jimmy McCullough and offensive guard Ken Sewell. Sewell was named the most outstanding lineman on his team and also achieved a perfect 4.0 grade point average last semester. McCullough, also an outstanding student with a 3.7 GPA last semester, is a speedster who can play either offense or defense.

The other four recruits are from teams in the Jayhawk Junior College Conference. They are defensive tackle Dana Dimel from Hutchinson Community College, defensive tackle Rocky Dvorak from Garden City Community College, receiver Don Cliggett from Pratt Community College and defensive tackle Reneth Reed from Dodge City Community College.

Reed was a first-team all-league pick last season and also was a first-team All-American for the Conquistadors. Pratt's Cliggett also was an All-America selection last season as well as earning first-team all-league laurels.

Dvorak is another first-team all-league standout at Garden City who could provide instant help. With a bench press ability of more than 400 pounds, Dimel could be one of the stronger players for the Wildcats. He can play either offensive or defensive tackle.

Coach Dickey said he is impressed with the signees' classroom abilities as well as their football talents.

"The athletes you recruit at midterm have to be good students, as well as good football players," he said. "And that's true with this group. I look forward to having them in school and at spring drills. I think they can make an immediate impact on our team and challenge for starting berths."

Football recruiters check players' grades, skill

By TOM FAY
Collegian Reporter

Geographic location, grades and athletic achievements all are things K-State football recruiters look for before signing an athlete.

"The recruiting process begins by deciding what areas you're going to recruit," said Chuck Driesbach, K-State assistant football coach. K-State recruits players from the state of Kansas, metropolitan areas such as St. Louis, Omaha and Dallas and sometimes even Florida and California.

After the areas are chosen, mailings are sent to high schools in those areas for the coaches' recommendations. The recruiting staff at K-State, consisting of nine full-time coaches and the head coach, decides who they need depending on position, size, speed and grades, Driesbach said.

Driesbach said the contact process begins during a player's junior year in high school by sending him a letter containing a questionnaire. The questionnaire, which requests information about size, speed and interest of study, is completed by the player and returned to K-State.

"For example, if he (the player) writes down engineering, we really feel that's good. We've got an excellent engineering program here, so that's somebody we have a good shot at," Driesbach said.

There is a period of spring recruiting when university coaches are allowed to go out for one month to visit high schools.

"We are not allowed to make contact with any prospects, but we're allowed to watch films and visit the coaches," Driesbach said.

After this process, the coaches know who they are interested in recruiting, especially among the in-state prospects.

The recruits are then invited to watch a K-State game, and University coaches may go out and watch them play at their high schools, Driesbach said.

"We are still not allowed to talk to them in person on campus until after Dec. 1," Driesbach said. "But we're allowed to talk to them over the phone."

A total of six contacts may be made after Dec. 1, three in the prospect's high school and three in his home, he said.

Next, the recruiting staff goes to the high schools to talk to players to see if they are interested in playing for K-State. If they are, a formal University visit is arranged, Driesbach said.

On recruiting weekends, recruits visit the University and are shown the training (meal) table. An academic appointment is arranged with faculty members, and the recruit is given a tour of campus. A community resident also shows them around Manhattan, and the recruit may go out with the players in the evening to view the social life.

Coach Jim Dickey decides if the player fits into the program and whether to offer him a scholarship.

Players are allowed to visit only five universities.

"An official visit consists of the University paying for their transportation, room and board. They're allowed to make as many unofficial visits as they like," Driesbach said.

If a player decides to attend K-State, he can sign a national letter of intent on signing day, Feb. 8.

Contact is kept with the recruit throughout the summer until he comes to K-State in the fall.

"We're allowed to bring in 95 players to look at per year," Driesbach said. "Of the 95, the most we're allowed to sign is 30, which depends upon how many scholarships we're allowed to give that particular year," he said.

Raider thinks 'Skins' fullback 'crazy'; Riggins wants head to hit 'soft spot'

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Marcus Allen of the Los Angeles Raiders thinks John Riggins may be just a bit crazy, and as if to prove it, the Washington fullback showed up Wednesday in paratrooper garb for his one-man show at the Super Bowl.

Riggins has become something of an event in his own right.

Last year, before his record-breaking performance in the Redskins' 27-17 Super Bowl victory over Miami, he established his own tradition of sorts, disdaining the tables set up for interviews and conducting, instead, his own news conference, a practice previously limited to the head coaches. And he did it in military fatigues.

Riggins also showed up at a pre-game party decked out in white tie and tails. On Wednesday, again in military dress, Riggins set himself apart, holding center stage before reporters arrived.

"You're probably wondering why I'm dressed like this, right?" he began. Then, with his best General George Patton-George C. Scott bluster, he explained:

"Well, last year the Redskins marched on Miami. This year we shall fly over L.A. The bombs will be hot and heavy in the first half, allowing our ground troops to position themselves to carry us to victory."

"This," he said, pointing at his heavily emblazoned shirt, "is from the D.C. Air National Guard — so be careful what you say, or you may be visited by an F-4 Phantom fighter."

Asked how he felt about the promise made by Raiders' defensive end Lyle Alzado to "tear Riggins' head off," Riggins said he'd spent Tuesday's photo session at Tampa Stadium "looking for a soft spot so when he knocks my block off, it'll fall in a nice, soft spot and won't get all bruised up — and I hope he's enough of a gentleman to hand it back to me."

Later Wednesday, at the Raiders' hotel, Alzado responded in kind. "I hope when he runs over my chest," he said, "that he stops to dust off the cleat marks."

Riggins is a bulldozing runner, straight ahead, knocking down as many people as he can. No finesse — but wildly outspoken. Allen, his counterpart, is a tailback with all the moves — but relatively quiet.

"I think I'm pretty outgoing, but I'm not into what he does," Allen said of Riggins. "I like John a lot, and I'm saying this with affection. A lot of people say he's crazy and well, maybe he is — a little. But that's his thing. It's not mine."

As for the Raiders, some of whom also have a reputation of being off-center, Allen said, "They're all normal — in their own way."

Riggins carried the ball 375 times during the season, Allen 226.

"The more times you get the ball, the better you feel," Allen said.

Explosion, deaths instigate Navy search of old firing range

By The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — Forty years ago, an anti-tank crew sent an artillery round whistling deep into the Camp Elliott firing range. Last month it exploded, killing two boys.

That practice round was just one of thousands lobbed into wide open spaces, and the fact that it failed to detonate on impact was of little concern at the time.

But part of the public land is now packed with homes, and the Navy will begin searching hundreds of acres today for more old shells.

Meanwhile, the San Diego Fire Department has held seminars to warn school children of the danger of handling old shells. Spokesman Dennis McNeill called on parents to "teach their kids...it's not a toy."

That's the same message that Charles A. Peake, a deputy district attorney, had given to his sons.

"It's something I knew about, having been in the Airborne Special Services in Vietnam," Peake said.

"Corey and Carl knew that stuff was verboten (forbidden)."

Eight-year-old Corey, 12-year-old Carl and a friend, 8-year-old Matthew Smith, happened upon an old artillery shell Dec. 10. They looked at it, turned it over in their hands, and hit it against a rock.

The explosion killed Corey and Matthew and injured Carl.

"If I had known there was a danger like this, I wouldn't have let him play down in the canyon," said Robin Smith, Matthew's father.

The Smith family had lived for seven years in Tierrasanta, the neighborhood that was born in the late 1960s on part of the old Camp Elliott artillery range.

According to Navy Cmdr. Paul Mallett, who has spent hours poring over the history of Camp Elliott, the 43-square-mile installation "was way out in country at that time." Far to the west, at the edge of San Diego Bay, was the city of San Diego, then a community of about 200,000.

After the war, Camp Elliott closed and San Diego became a boom town. As the population rocketed toward 1 million, the city expanded inland.

Construction on Tierrasanta was halted many times when equipment unearthed an old round.

Heavy rains eroding the large expanse of open country down the hillside from the housing development have turned up more buried danger.

There have been incidents before — for instance, three children were injured by shrapnel in a 1978 blast — but the two recent deaths prompted action.

City officials called for a sweep of the old impact area, and the Navy, at the behest of the city, organized four 10-man search teams under Mallett's command.

When it turned the land over to the city in 1964, the Navy said it couldn't guarantee that ammunition wouldn't turn up.

Voter requirements hinder registration

By The College Press Service

WILMINGTON, Del. — When their voter registration drive netted over 1,856 signatures in early November — 356 more than the projected goal of 1,500 — the College Democrats at the University of Delaware basked in success and optimism.

Two weeks later, the local election board informed them that all 1,856 signatures had been rejected because the group failed to prove the signers were permanent residents of the state.

At about the same time, 3,000 Rutgers students learned they wouldn't be able to vote locally because they had not completed pre-registration forms mailed to them over the summer.

In October, a New York election judge denied State University of New York College Purchase students the right to vote locally because the campus dormitory addresses cannot be considered permanent residences.

It has happened at campus after campus: the best-laid plans of ambitious student voter-registration drives are lost because of peculiar local eligibility rules, locking students out of the electoral process.

And it promises to happen with increasing frequency in the coming weeks as a variety of groups and candidates — College Democrats, College Republicans, Public Interest Research Groups (PIRGs), National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), United States Student Association (USSA) and the Hart and Jackson campaigns, among others — all try to keep promises to help masses of students register to vote during the 1984 primary and general presidential elections.

Many of them are finding, however, that the inconsistent and seemingly-whimsical voting requirements of local election officials are a much bigger problem than student apathy.

"It really is a big mess," said Kathy Downey, who just completed an in-depth study of student voter registration problems for the National Student Educational Fund (NSEF).

"It's really discrimination against students by the local election officials," she said. "When local powers get nervous about the student vote, the fact that in many places students could actually change the result of an election, they put as much in the way (of students registering) as possible."

"In some states you can just mail in post cards and you're registered," Gwen McKinney, director of the USSA's voter registration drive, said.

"In other states, you have to be deputized and live in the county to be certified to register people," she said. "The key to avoiding problems is to provide project participants with extensive training and information on local election laws."

The national PIRG campaign to register students "will place a real big emphasis on going through the right channels to get people registered," said Beth Pardo, a member of the Massachusetts PIRG which is coordinating the national registration drive.

To drill student volunteers on such basic information, PIRG coordinators are planning a national convention and training seminar in early February, Pardo said.

Not all student groups are as concerned.

"It's a problem from time to time, but certainly not a major one," said Jack Abramoff, president of the College Republicans National Committee, which plans to register over one million voters by this fall.

"Most Republican students go out to register themselves and are usually familiar with their local registration requirements," he said.

Legislator resigns Senate seat to join economic department

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, an 18-year veteran of the Legislature and the only black member of the Senate, confirmed Wednesday he will resign his seat in April to accept appointment to a post in the state Economic Development Department.

Charles "Jamie" Schwartz, KDE secretary, said Tuesday night McCray had accepted the appointment, but McCray declined to discuss it until Wednesday after a disagreement over when he should quit the Senate was settled.

Schwartz had wanted McCray to begin work Feb. 11 as director of the Division of Minority Business, but that plan hit a snag when Senate Minority Leader Jack Steineger of Kansas City opposed the agency's taking McCray before the session ended.

McCray, 55, a real estate salesman, said he looks forward "to the new challenge with gusto."

Robot guards to patrol prison halls

By The Associated Press

WOBURN, Mass. — He's called Denny, a 4-foot, 400-pound robot who looks like a cross between R2D2 and Darth Vader. Sometime next year, the squat automaton could be patrolling prison corridors, sniffing out inmates and warning, "You have been detected."

Denning Mobile Robotics Inc., a fledgling high-tech company, has signed a five-year contract to produce as many as 1,000 robots for Southern Steel Co., of San Antonio, Texas, the nation's largest manufacturer of prison security systems.

Under the agreement, Denning will manufacture the robots and Southern will sell them to prisons for about $30,000 each.

Ben Wellington, marketing vice president for Denning, said it is the first major contract for roving guard robots.

"The task is not so much to replace guards but to replace the functions that are dangerous or boring," said Wellington. "The robot can maintain the same level of consciousness. It doesn't get sleepy or careless."

The robot will tool along at 3 mph on three wheels, feeling its way along hallways with a sonar rangefinder developed by Polaroid Corp. It will hunt for unauthorized intruders with infrared and ultrasonic sensors and an ammonia "sniffer" that can smell the faint odor given off by humans. Some robots will also carry television cameras.

All information will be transmitted to a control room run by humans.

If the machine encounters an intruder, it will warn in a stern voice, "You have been detected." A limited vocabulary will allow the robot to say several other phrases, including, "Who are you?"

"It's designed to get a verbal response," said Wellington. "It can't understand things that are said to it, but if someone answers it, that confirms it's found someone."

The robot will carry no weapons, but will be able to handle the hard knocks of prison life.

The robot will be waterproof, able to function in the blast of a fire hose. Its computer will be in a bulletproof case.

A version of the robot could be sent on "suicide" missions in riots, transmitting back pictures and data as long as it survives.

Wellington said two Motorola 6800 32-bit microprocessors will allow the robot to find its way in a strange building, recognize landmarks, and even diagnose its own internal ailments. When its batteries run low, it will automatically return to a charging station.

The first prototype of the robot is already completed. A working model will be ready this fall and Denning has an agreement to test its product in security-related tasks with New York's Chase Manhattan Bank and an unidentified Boston financial firm.

Up in the air is the robot's image. Wellington said his firm is trying to settle on a body that looks "businesslike, but menacing."

The same problem goes for the robot's name.

The robot is known as "Denny" among Denning employees, but Wellington said, "that's too friendly."

"Hopefully we'll come up with something more menacing by the time we go into production," he said.

Reagan lifts more sanctions against Poland

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Responding to an appeal from Nobel Prize-winner Lech Walesa, President Reagan has lifted more of the sanctions he imposed against Poland in 1981, even though the military government has not met all his conditions for doing so, officials said Thursday.

Reagan will allow the Polish government airline LOT to resume landing charter flights in the United States, and Polish fishermen to fish in U.S. waters again. Some other U.S. sanctions imposed after Polish authorities declared martial law in 1981 remain in effect.

State Department spokesman Alan Romberg said an appeal last month by Walesa, leader of Poland's banned Solidarity trade union, weighed heavily in the decision, and other factors were the release of the "vast majority" of Polish political prisoners and the successful Polish visit of Pope John Paul II last year.

Romberg said Poland sought U.S. landing rights for 88 charter flights a year, "and that is the number that they have been granted." He said he did not know the purpose of the flights.

Romberg said the precise fishing quota for Polish fishermen in 1984 would be decided later.

"Very serious human rights problems" still exist in Poland, he said, and Reagan's easing of sanctions was part of a step-by-step approach aimed at improving conditions for the Polish people.

The Polish government, which held 6,000 political prisoners after imposing martial law, says the number detained now totals about 200. Romberg could not say how many were released or still are in custody.

Reagan ordered sanctions against Poland just days after martial law was imposed Dec. 13, 1981, and a ban was imposed on Solidarity.

At the time Reagan said the Soviets had to shoulder a major share of the blame for developments in Poland, saying events there were "precipitated by public and secret pressure from the Soviet Union."

A gradual lifting of the sanctions began late last year even though not all of Reagan's conditions had been met. Among the conditions were an end to martial law, releasing detainees and reopening "a genuine dialogue with Solidarity, led by Lech Walesa."

Martial law technically has been lifted and most detainees released. But U.S. officials say they have abandoned hope that the government of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski will reopen talks with Walesa or lift the ban on Solidarity.

On Nov. 2, Reagan lifted the sanction against rescheduling talks for Poland's official debts and allowed the Poles to enter fishing quota negotiations for 1983.

Sanctions remaining in effect include a freeze of economic credits and withdrawal of most-favored-nation trading status, which permits goods to enter the United States at reduced tariff rates. Also still in effect is a ban on regularly scheduled Polish airline flights and on shipments of non-humanitarian agricultural commodities for distribution by the Polish government.

Romberg said among the human rights problems remaining in Poland is the forthcoming trial of 11 Solidarity union and other activists.

Eagle eye

Arms talks still closed, Shultz says

By The Associated Press

OSLO, Norway — Secretary of State George Shultz, acknowledging he made no headway in reopening nuclear arms talks with the Soviets, vowed Thursday the United States would maintain its "willpower and self-confidence" while seeking new opportunities for negotiation.

Shultz said he had "nothing positive to report" after his five-hour meeting in Stockholm Wednesday with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko on breaking the deadlock in the negotiations.

But he also indicated the Soviets may be preparing to reopen talks limiting conventional forces in Europe. The talks, suspended a month ago, "are in a somewhat different category for the Soviets."

The talks, called Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions, focus on the troops stationed in Europe by NATO and the Warsaw Pact. In Stockholm, Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom said they might begin by March.

Shultz rejected Gromyko's bitter condemnation of U.S. policies in a speech Wednesday to the 35-nation disarmament conference in Stockholm as "incorrect and unacceptable." The Soviet foreign minister denounced the United States as the main threat to peace in the world.

Shultz assailed the Soviets as promoting unrest in Central America by shipping arms to revolutionary forces there: "Nicaragua has become a place from which there is an effort being made to export subversion. Through the flow of armaments that originate in the Soviet Union or in allies of the Soviet Union and flowing through Cuba...the influence of that system has arisen."

The Soviets suspended arms talks in Geneva in late November to protest NATO's deployment of new U.S.-built Pershing II missiles in West Germany and cruise missiles in Britain. Last month, parallel talks to cut back long-range weapons also stalled.

Asked about their discussions on how to resume the Geneva talks, Shultz said, "It was not in any sense a negotiation or anything approaching a real discussion of the subject matter as such, but there is no agreement at this point on how to conduct those talks."

He said he and Gromyko "discussed many different aspects of arms

Former student defends Mahaffey during hearing

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

The sexist comments Ben Mahaffey supposedly made in class were taken out of context by other students in the class, a witness for Mahaffey said Thursday during the third day of the associate professor's appeal hearing.

Kelley Collins, a 1981 graduate in forestry with a parks and recreation option, testified that during the fall 1981 semester, two women students misinterpreted statements Mahaffey made in her Parks Administration and Management class. She said she was not aware of Mahaffey making the statement "women were not good one week out of the month" in that class — a class she attended regularly.

"I don't recall a statement like that at all — using the term 'no good,'" Collins said.

A statement about women being less emotionally stable than men also was taken out of context, she said. Mahaffey had been talking about administrators having to consider employee's personal problems, she said, when he said women were more emotional than men.

"This was kind of in the same discussion," she said, and added that Mahaffey said, "'You've got to realize there will be those women who have problems, and you've got to look out for those types as a potential problem.'"

But on the day in question, the two students reportedly took the statements out of context.

"I think they blew it out of proportion," Collins said. "I knew that Laura (Bergen) didn't like Dr. Mahaffey, and I think because of her dislike, she took it out of context and made it sound different than it was."

Collins said Mahaffey was one of the five best professors she had while at K-State, classifying the professors as being good lecturers, using visual aides effectively and encouraging students to see them about problems.

"They were generally dynamic speakers," she said.

Collins took five classes from Mahaffey, and every one was a learning experience involving frequent class discussions, she said. Mahaffey would often play the "devil's advocate" in the discussions, she said, and showed enthusiasm for the class.

"He expected a lot. He expected the best out of people and for them to try their best," she said.

Because Thursday was the only day Collins could be in Manhattan for the hearing, the University's case was interrupted to allow her testimony. Mahaffey, a tenured faculty member, is appealing his Sept. 1 suspension from University duties and recommended dismissal.

Collins and the two other students she referred to in her testimony were among seven women students contacted in mid-1981 by John Steffan, professor of administration and foundation, who had been asked to investigate the complaints of Mahaffey making sexist comments. Of the seven women, Collins was the only one who did not believe Mahaffey's statements had been sexist.

In May 1982 John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture, asked Ray Olson, professor of agronomy, to head an external review of the Department of Forestry. Olson, who also testified Thursday, said the review committee was asked to see if the department's faculty evaluation procedure had improved, if there was any hindering of faculty's right to due process, and whether the conflicts revolving around Mahaffey had improved.

Mahaffey had claimed in the three grievances he had filed with Faculty Senate over the years that he had been the victim of unfair evaluations and that his right to due process had been hindered.

Using an anonymous questionnaire, the committee polled faculty members about the department's situation. The committee found that evaluation procedures had improved and there had been no hindrance in faculty members' due process.

In the end, the committee reported that as long as Mahaffey remained at K-State, the forestry department would not be able to function properly. In other words, Olson testified, Mahaffey should be dismissed for the department's benefit.

Beginning testimony Thursday was Harold Gallaher, former head of the forestry department. He will finish his testimony today when the hearing resumes at 9 a.m. in Union Room 212.

Gallaher said Mahaffey's teaching contract was reduced from 12 months to nine months in September 1981 because he had not obtained research grants. Gallaher said other considerations in making the contract change were Mahaffey's admission that he was being "underutilized" and his frequent office absences.

Carlin gains House passage of prison overcrowding bill

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

The Kansas House passed a $2.7 million package Thursday, thereby delivering to Gov. John Carlin the legislation he requested to help alleviate the state's prison overcrowding problem.

The bills, which passed unanimously in the Senate Jan. 11, provided for the establishment of pre-release centers and pre-release programs for minimum security inmates within 90 days of being eligible for parole.

One of the bills provided finances for pre-release centers accommodating 209 inmates at the Topeka State Hospital and Winfield State Hospital, and an outside dormitory housing 127 inmates at the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

The second measure authorized the Secretary of Corrections to establish a pre-release program under which inmates will receive training and other services to better prepare themselves for release upon parole.

The bill providing for pre-release programs came under stiff attack from House Majority Leader Joseph Hoagland, R-Overland Park. Hoagland said most legislators do not understand exactly who would be eligible for the programs.

"The Senate voted this through 40-0 and didn't understand who was eligible," Hoagland said.

The bill does not say people within 90 days of parole can be released to the new centers, Hoagland said. Rather, it will be people within 90 days of asking for parole, he said.

"Only 45 percent are ever paroled the first time," Hoagland said.

Hoagland proposed an amendment which would not allow inmates to be eligible for the program unless they had first been screened and found to be good candidates for parole.

Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola, argued for the amendment because she said she feared the type of people who might be released into the program to alleviate overcrowding.

For example, the man convicted of the recent "vicious" Iola murders was only charged with a class D felony, Apt said. He could be eligible for parole in a relatively short time, she said.

However, Rep. Jack Schriver, D-Arkansas City, said he would support legislation which qualified the program later, but "we have to move now."

Schriver said the people of Winfield had much input on the current proposal and had agreed to accept the bill in its original form.

"I beg you to put no amendments on this bill," Schriver said. He said

Past dean's donation improves atmosphere, facilities at Lafene

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

With the help of a $232,500 donation, Lafene Student Health Center has made changes to improve its performance and upgrade its image.

The donation was made by Conrad J.K. Eriksen, former dean of the K-State College of Business Administration.

Money from the donation, which was made in 1974, was not available until Jan. 1, 1981, due to a stipulation in the donation agreement which allows Lafene to use only the interest drawn from the money.

Dr. Robert C. Tout, director of student health, estimated the average interest to be $15,000 to $20,000 a year.

Some of the physical changes made include the remodeling of the Lafemme clinic. Several rooms in the basement of the building which had been used for storage also were remodeled to provide more room for the clinic. Previously, the clinic occupied two small rooms on the main floor. The remodeling was completed in September 1982.

The waiting room on the main floor of Lafene also was remodeled late in 1982.

"The remodeling of the waiting room had been proposed years ago, but it was not approved by the Student Advisory Committee," Tout said.

Carpeting, new chairs and woodwork were added to the room along with a blood pressure computer.

"We are only able to treat fee-paying students, not faculty or staff," Tout said, "however, there are a lot of high-stressed professors on campus, and now they can come in and take their blood pressure whenever they like."

The money also was used to remodel a hospital room and to add a patient lounge. The lounge was converted from a hospital room on the second floor. The pleasant atmosphere and nice surroundings make parents more comfortable about keeping their children in Lafene when they're sick, rather than transferring them to a larger city hospital, Tout said.

The equipment purchased with the money includes an emergency room table and other examination tables.

Also purchased were a coultor counter, used to determine blood counts, and a cryosurgical unit, used in freezing procedures. Two

Communications staff win awards

Publications and writing efforts by K-State's communications staff were recognized earlier this week at the Council for Advancement and Support of Education (CASE) District VI awards competition in Colorado Springs, Colo.

"The Library Insider," by Rob Bower, publications editor, and John Van der Velde, assistant professor in the library, earned an Award of Excellence.

Merit Awards went to Tim Lindemuth for the University's faculty and staff newsletter, "In-View," and to Karyn Gibson of the publications staff for illustration of the University Catalog.

At the conference business meeting, Gibson was named Kansas Chairman for Membership for the coming year.

Professor to examine TV's impact

The relationship of television to public perceptions of conflict situations will be the topic for research to be conducted by T. Alden Williams, professor of political science, while on sabbatical leave during the 1984 spring semester.

Williams said he will study how TV coverage relates to public perceptions of such conflicts as the Vietnam War, the Northern Ireland rebellion and the kidnapping of Israeli athletes during the Olympic Games in Munich.

He will conduct his research at the Television News Archives at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tenn. He will publish his findings as part of a continuing series of articles in the field of conflict resolution.

Farm Bureau aids cancer research

The Kansas Farm Bureau Triangle Club of Manhattan, an internal service organization for employees of Kansas Farm Bureau, recently made a cash donation in support of the cancer research and education programs in the Center for Basic Cancer Research at K-State.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology and the Cancer Center, said continued support of this organization has been instrumental in the success and progress of the cancer center and its programs.

The Center for Basic Cancer Research is the only such center in the state. The research efforts of the scientists and students associated with this center are directed towards providing basic information to understand cancers and to improve treatment for cancer patients.

Economics professor writes book

K-State economics professor E. Wayne Nafziger is author of a new book, "The Economics of Developing Countries," just published by Wadsworth Publishing Co., Belmont, Calif.

The book, written for the beginning student and for the lay reader, emphasizes poverty, inequality, unemployment and the deficiencies of food, clothing, housing, education and health of people in third-world countries.

Nafziger, who has taught at K-State since 1966, has been a visiting professor at the International University of Japan and at Andhra University in India and has been a research fellow at Cambridge University, the East-West Center (Honolulu) and the University of Nigeria. He is the author of four other books on third-world economics.

Speaker to discuss nutrient cycling

Frank Gilliam, who recently joined the Konza Prairie Long-Term Ecological Research staff, will present a seminar at 4 p.m. today in Ackert 221. His topic will be "Fire and Nutrient Cycling in the Coastal Plain of the Southeastern United States."

Gilliam will discuss studies that were established to characterize components of nutrient dynamics for two watersheds in the Southeastern Coastal Plain of South Carolina, with additional emphasis placed on the effects of fire in the ecosystems there.

Biologist relates eagle traits, habits

In greek mythology, the eagle was associated with imperial power. Man has always been fascinated by this majestic bird, Joe Schaefer said in a speech to the Northern Flint Hills Audubon Society Wednesday night.

Schaefer is a non-game, urban biologist from Wichita. He spoke to the group about the history of attitudes toward the eagle, the biological life of an eagle and identification characteristics to help the members identify eagles during their upcoming field trip.

The bald eagle was chosen as the United States' national bird because its flight is restricted to North America. Bald does not refer to the lack of head covering on the bird, but to the white feathers on its head and face.

Ben Franklin argued that the bald eagle was a "rank coward" and suggested instead that the turkey should be our national bird. Franklin called the eagle a coward because it will, at times, pursue smaller birds and claim the prey they haven't caught.

In Kansas, bald eagles have been documented in 94 counties. Golden eagles have been spotted in 85 counties. In 1983, 20 bald eagles were seen in the Tuttle Creek Reservoir area.

A count is made each year in January across the United States. In Kansas, this survey is coordinated by the Kansas Fish and Game Commission, Schaefer said.

Bald eagles nest near water and eat mainly fish. Occasionally they supplement their diet with ducks. During the breeding season their diet is 90 percent fish, he said.

No bald eagles nest in the spring and summer in Kansas due to the disturbance of the water by people during warm weather. Winter nests have been sighted, however. Nesting has not been documented during the breeding season.

"If activity around water was limited, I believe we might see bald eagles nesting in Kansas," Schaefer said.

During his slide presentation Schaefer showed diagrams that outlined the differences between young and adult birds and the differences between the golden eagle and the bald eagle.

Non-members who are interested in seeing the bald eagles that nest in this area should meet on Saturday in Ackert 120 at 9 a.m. for a field trip to Tuttle Creek Reservoir. A short film will be shown before leaving, and transportation will be provided.

Printing facilities improved

K-State's Printing Service moved a new press into the basement of Kedzie Hall Wednesday as the first part of a modernization project.

The new press, a Miller TP 36, is a two-color press and able to handle sheets of paper up to 25 1/4 inches by 36 inches. This step of the modernization will enhance the commercial business of the printing service, because more services may be offered, Roger Williams, director of the Printing Service, said.

"Currently we've been able to handle four pages of eight and one half by 11 (inch) paper at one time, but with the Miller (press) we'll be able to do 16 pages at the same time," Williams said.

One of the largest jobs Williams said he hopes the new press will enable the service to get is the University's "Discover" booklet, which is currently published by a state printer.

Other steps of the modernization project include obtaining floppy disk typesetting machines and machinery needed to communicate with other campus word processors and upgrading the mailing services.

Village Plaza construction continues

Manhattan contractors are making strides toward completion of a commercial building behind the Alco store in Village Plaza.

Completion of the $2.2 million project is set for sometime in May, said Jim Hubbard, of Hallmark Investment Co., developer of the facility. Approximately 12 retail businesses will lease space in the 37,310 square-foot brick building, he said.

A slightly less than three-acre parking lot will accompany the building, Hubbard said. Hallmark hopes to see increases in business in the Westloop area after the project is completed, he said.

"If it doesn't increase business in Westloop, I've made a big mistake," he said.

Dr. S.K. Gandhi, great-grandson of Mohandes Gandhi, reminisces with Mrs. Paul Young, Manhattan resident, after Dr. Gandhi spoke to students in the Union Catskeller Thursday at noon. Young was a patient of Dr. Gandhi, who now lives and practices as a heart surgeon in Topeka.

Gandhi descendant says peace feasible

By BEVERLY MILLER
Collegian Reporter

The hope for world peace depends on the younger generation, Dr. S.K. Gandhi said, speaking in the Union Catskeller at noon Thursday. The great-grandson of the Indian leader, Mohandes Gandhi, was the first guest of the "Let's Talk About It" series this semester.

In his lecture, the Topeka heart surgeon explored the question, "Is peace a fantasy?" He said world peace could be achieved if attempted through the efforts of the hundreds of peace organizations working toward the same goal.

"Unite all those working for peace into coalitions, coalitions of people's organizations, with pooled resources, leadership and energy so powerful as to extend the hand of friendship in a myriad of ways to other people," he said.

Gandhi said he would have the Russian farmer meet with the Kansas farmer to share mutual feelings about their families, farms and their countries.

He said he would have universities "exchange not one or two students but 500, even 10,000 students, every year. If the Russian government refused to exchange, they would lose face, they would look bad," he said.

Referring to his great-grandfather's use of non-violence,

Gandhi called it "an ideology of one man, not a means or way to achieve things."

Gandhi, the leader, knew his enemy well and used psychology on them. The same technique might not have succeeded if applied to Germany, for example, S.K. Gandhi said.

Giving an example of how non-violence might have been applied recently, Gandhi cited the shooting down of the Korean airliner by the Soviet Union.

In a case like that, he said he would have sent one airplane full of volunteers to fly over the Soviet Union and to land in Moscow. These people would ask to speak not with the government, but with the Russian people.

Since the government is not likely to allow this, "they would put us in a building and lock us up. But then there would be another plane load waiting. How many people are they going to lock up? There has to be some end to it. This would have perhaps been Gandhi's approach," he said.

During the question and answer session which followed his talk, Gandhi said the need to oppose and remove oppression in the world should be a goal for everyone.

"You do it through parents teaching their children basic goodness. It can only come in time."

Salary increase still inadequate

Gov. John Carlin has said that education is the most important issue facing Kansans in the current session of the Legislature.

In an attempt to do something about the declining purchasing power of university professors, Carlin has declared an across-the-board faculty salary increase of 6 percent for teachers, which also is to be accompanied by an additional $2 million special faculty salary improvement fund.

When compared to other National Association of State University and Land-Grant Colleges, K-State salaries are 13 percent below the national average.

When compared to other peer institutions, K-State is 6 percent below the average salary and 11 percent below the average needed to tie the highest salary. Peer institutions are those land-grant colleges similar to K-State in their range of doctoral and undergraduate programs and number of students. They are Iowa State, Colorado State, Oregon State, North Carolina State and Oklahoma State.

It would seem that the governor has recognized the problem of faculty salaries, but has done little else to correct it.

Providing that other peer institutions receive no raise at all, the 6 percent raise would only make our faculty salaries average. In reality, the 6 percent will not make K-State competitive at all.

Past programs the state has set up to make teaching at the University attractive have been missing the point.

Last year, Carlin set up a special fund to attract high technology industries to the state, while doing very little about the embarrassingly low salaries which K-State and other Kansas university faculty are being paid.

This is like trying to paint the house while the foundation is rotting.

If the governor wants such programs to be effective, he is going to have to make K-State more attractive to professors, and the best way to do this would be to increase salaries so that K-State can be competitive.

According to a Faculty Senate report prepared by the Faculty Affairs Subcommittee about faculty salaries and fringe benefits, the per capita income for other Kansans has risen approximately 20 percent after being adjusted for inflation. Faculty salaries, meanwhile, have decreased by 20 percent.

If we don't pay for the cost of a good education now, we will have to pay for it later, and we can't afford to wait any longer.

Pentagon's attitude too hawkish

The Pentagon is not satisfied with building an already excessive nuclear arsenal in preparation for World War III. Now they're getting ready for World War IV.

Officials at the Pentagon believe that in the event of a catastrophic nuclear war, "existing satellites, ground-relay stations and processing facilities" would be destroyed after the United States and the Soviet Union launched all their nuclear weapons at each other. Assuming there is still enough Soviet life to threaten the United States, the Pentagon has an ingenious plan to win the war.

A Poseidon submarine would be armed with ballistic missiles and hidden under the Arctic ice cap throughout the nuclear exchange. Once firing ceased, the submarine would emerge to harass whoever and whatever is left if Soviet leaders refuse to cooperate.

In addition, other secret, hidden bombers and missiles could be commanded to strike the Soviet Union from specially protected mobile units.

Obviously the Pentagon decided this would be a good way to use some of the massive budget allocated to it for defense buildup. But their plans are senseless. No matter how sophisticated and complex the backup systems will be, they would have to be activated by someone in command. The Pentagon presumes that the National Command Authority, with a line of succession and control that runs from president to vice president to the secretary of defense and his civilian deputies, would survive to oversee the deployment of the submarine and bombers.

But what if they haven't survived World War III? One well-aimed Soviet warhead could obliterate Washington, D.C. The system would be useless.

The Pentagon plan assumes, of course, that the United States wins World War III. Is this a realistic approach? They should not ignore the fact that the Soviet Union is extremely well prepared for nuclear war. Not only are its citizens well-versed on civil defense, but the Soviets assume any nuclear exchange would be short and casual, far from total destruction of the planet. In fact, to prevent a loss of power after World War III, the Soviets have special reserve factories ready to resume manufacture and assure economic stability.

Concurrent with the Pentagon's latest buildup, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko has called the U.S. nuclear buildup a "pathological obsession." And late last year the Soviets walked out of disarmament talks with the United States in disgust. Maybe the Pentagon, and the Reagan administration that provides its excessive funding, should re-examine its hawkish attitude. According to recent indications, the Soviets are more concerned about peace than we are.

Housing's policy on keys needs examining

Editor,

Re: "Lost keys lock Boyd Hall assistant out of job," in the Jan. 16 Collegian, and "Third-floor Boyd residents plead for new locks," in the Jan. 19 Collegian.

I am writing to clarify several facts used in your stories.

First, I told your reporter, Mary Cox, that I believe the keys were stolen from my room. In her article, Cox reported that the keys were lost, which is not what I had told her. I still feel the keys in question were stolen, and I have reported that to the police and the Department of Housing. If Cox didn't believe me when I told her I felt the keys were stolen, and not lost, she could have covered herself by simply stating that the keys had "disappeared."

The real issue here is that a resident assistant can be discharged from her paid position by the University for having the keys stolen from her room. In other words, if someone commits a crime against an RA, it is the RA who gets the blame and is subject to the consequences, in this case being fired.

This issue was simply overlooked by the Collegian in the two articles covering the incident. Of course the residents are the only people who knew where my keys were kept, and what those keys opened. And I suppose that casts suspicion upon all of the residents of the dormitory.

What all of this boils down to in the final analysis is the University's unwritten and undocumented policy of discharging an RA who is the victim of a crime. And that's the important story that was missed by Cox and the Collegian. If you are going to report and investigate, at least investigate and report the right facts. Frankly, I don't need any more publicity, good or bad, but we could certainly use some probing of the Department of Housing and its policies in matters such as this.

Funds hinder women candidates

WASHINGTON — Despite earlier signs to the contrary, fewer women than expected have decided to run for political office this year. The key obstacle appears to be one that could prove a problem beyond 1984.

That obstacle is cash. Unfortunately, sophisticated direct-mail techniques and favorable media hype have yet to overcome one hard-and-fast tradition: Political fundraising is still a man's game.

Money problems are suggested in the disappointing number of women who've filed for federal and state political offices. In the House, the 22 women incumbents — 13 Democrats and nine Republicans — are expected to seek re-election. So far, there are 21 other women — 10 Democrats and 11 Republicans — either challenging an incumbent or running for an open seat.

The House is filled with potential opportunities for many more women candidates. Of its 435 members, there are 84 who won with only 55 percent of the vote or less — a standard measure of vulnerability — in 1982; only one member of this group (California Democrat Barbara Boxer, with 52 percent) was a woman. Retirement plans and aspirations for higher office have provided additional opportunities for women candidates, and in the next few months could provide more.

Meanwhile, seven women — four Democrats and three Republicans — are seeking to unseat Senate incumbents of the opposite party in only six states: Colorado, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Oregon and Virginia. That number in itself represents an increase over 1982.

But of the 10 Senate candidates who won in 1978 with 55 percent of the vote or less, only one — Virginia Republican John Warner — came from a state in which a woman is running for the Senate this year. That means there are at least nine more races in which women could run with a reasonably good chance of winning.

MAXWELL GLEN

Opportunities in the statehouses haven't drawn a crowd of women candidates. Of the 13 governorships being contested, eight were last won with 55 percent or less, but only one woman (Vermont Democrat Madeleine Kunin) has become a gubernatorial candidate so far.

In the state legislatures, women candidates are expected to be both more numerous and more successful. Two years ago, 1,666 women ran for state legislative office, and 908 won. With holdovers, that gave women more than 13 percent of the nation's 7,600 state legislative seats, or three times as many as they had 14 years ago.

But the slim field of female candidates at politics' higher echelons has not gone unnoticed by women's groups. As Kathy Wilson, the Republican chairman of the National Women's Political Caucus, recently told the Baltimore Sun, 1984 is "not going to be a banner year for women candidates."

Some sources among the women's groups contend that Wilson's prognosis could merit revision in months to come. "There's still time for more women to announce," one source said.

Yet those sources also confess that even Democratic Party leaders are still reluctant to commit themselves to women challengers or open-seat contestants in "marginal" races. Neither party, they say, seems to have recognized polls and statistics that indicate that women are both acceptable and, particularly in the more heavily-contested state races, successful as candidates. The result is insufficient financial support from the parties, which can help raise funds as well as contribute them directly.

Women's groups cannot fill the void. For example, three major groups — the National Organization for Women, the National Women's Political Caucus and the Women's Campaign Fund — have targeted about $2.5 million for campaign assistance this year, with most of the money earmarked for state legislative races. Their money, however, would amount to about only 0.2 percent of the billion-plus dollars spent at all levels of politics in 1980 alone.

But will the traditional and not-so-traditional sources and gatherers of funds — big and small contributors to the parties, dinner organizers and, yes, political action committees — help fill the gap? Probably not in the short term. Those who follow political fund-raising know not only that special interests tend to back incumbents, but also that relatively few women are involved in the fraternal process of soliciting money.

As more women find themselves in positions of financial clout, female candidates could benefit. Until then, many qualified aspirants will find themselves on the sidelines.

Union tobacco outlaw impending

We smokers and tobacco chewers on this campus have been silent long enough.

We've been silent for so long that the Union Governing Board has decided to consider at its Jan. 31 meeting a ban on all tobacco sales in the Union. This ludicrous action must be stopped at all costs.

While the mighty forces of all that's good and pure have been sweeping through the campus trying to dictate what's best for us, we've been sitting idly by, content to watch. Now, these do-gooders have the ball on the 1-yard line with seconds to go. Let's make 'em fumble.

As a smoker for almost six years, I realize smoke bothers some people. I make a point to ask if my smoke is invading somebody's "space," and I obey smoking rules no matter how ridiculous they may be. I also once chewed tobacco and was always careful to spit in a proper container and not the drinking fountain.

Of course, some smokers and chewers aren't as polite as I am, but non-users can be just as bothersome with their constant bellyaching. Believe it or not, more people complained about my chewing tobacco than my smoking.

But the issue at hand should not be whether to attempt to stamp out smoking and chewing. It should be the problems such a ban would cause for users, and the poor image it would create for the University. And the ones trying to railroad this through aren't the only ones paying activity fees.

As a student and a reporter, I arrive on campus as early as 8 a.m. and sometimes don't leave until 1:30 a.m. Some residence hall students who aren't blessed with motorized transportation rarely leave the campus at all, save for intermittent strolls to Aggieville.

What are we to do, then, if our supply of tobacco runs dry in the middle of a hectic day? If this ban takes effect, we will be forced either to grin and bear it or to "walk a mile for a Camel," as the slogan says.

LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

I don't know about the rest of you, but I would be mighty embarrassed if a visitor I invited to K-State went to the Union wanting to buy tobacco, only to be turned away by this idiotic legislation.

"You told me this was a conservative campus, but I didn't know it was that conservative," I can hear the visitor saying. Of course, the ban wouldn't serve to attract prospective students who smoke or chew because they might consider it an indication of other bad things to come both socially and academically. After all, there are many respectable universities elsewhere that sell tobacco, and even beer, in similar facilities.

Another problem we have overlooked so far is that of lost revenue, not so much from tobacco sales but from the other sales they generate. When smokers and chewers are forced to buy their tobacco elsewhere, they just might take some or all of their other business with them. This is a concern to all because when sales drop, activity fees often do the opposite.

So what can we do to stop this proposal from sliding through? Protest, protest and protest some more.

Of course, the possibility of no more tobacco in the Union need not lead to anarchy. I don't encourage that at all.

What I do encourage is a concerted effort by those concerned to let the UGB know where we stand on the issue by attending the meeting at 5:30 p.m. Jan. 31 in the Union conference room on the second floor and voicing our displeasure.

I'll be there and so will proponents of the ban. One person cannot, however, carry the burden alone.

Those unable to attend should contact members of the UGB. Their names are available by calling or visiting the Student Governing Association office on the lower level of the Union.

It also might be a good idea to let student senators know our position. It certainly couldn't hurt.

Mark your calendars, dial your telephones and write your letters. I'll see you at the meeting.

Committees seek new college deans

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

Search committees in three of K-State's academic colleges are preparing to fill vacancies that will come at the end of this semester when three deans step down from their positions.

By late February or early March, the colleges of Education, Architecture and Design, and Veterinary Medicine could have people to fill these vacancies, K-State Provost Owen Koeppel said.

"The search committees are hard at work, reviewing the nominees and their credentials for the position openings," Koeppel said.

The process of filling the position of dean begins with the formation of a search committee.

Each college's search committee generally consists of five or six faculty members from within the college, one or two students and a dean from outside of the college. In the case of the College of Veterinary Medicine, a practicing veterinarian was also asked to be on the search committee; in the College of Education, a superintendent of schools was asked to be on the search committee.

The committee evaluates the applications and submits a list of position nominations to the provost.

The next step in the process of finding a dean is inviting the candidates to spend two days visiting the campus and going through interviews, Koeppel said.

"On these visits, about half of the candidate's time is spent in the respective colleges — talking to the students, faculty and staff," he said.

After the campus visits, the committee reviews the candidates and submits another list of nominations to the provost.

The provost makes the final nominations, and the University president ends the search process by naming a new dean.

"The new dean (for each of the colleges) will assume the new position in early summer," Koeppel said.

In the College of Education, Dean Jordon Utsey will step down from the position that he has held for the past eight years. His future plans are "indefinite" at this time, but he said he will be taking a leave of absence from the University for a year.

"I thought about it (the decision) for a couple of months before I realized it was appropriate to move over," Utsey said. "My feeling is to leave the administration on an upbeat, and I feel the college is on an upbeat. So, someone can carry it on from here."

Utsey came to K-State in 1969 as an associate professor, and since then he has served as assistant dean and dean.

During this time, he said he has seen the college "move from a distant third to the largest education college in the state, and the college has moved into a new building (Blumont Hall)."

"It's been a happy eight years," Utsey said. "I've enjoyed being an administrator at K-State."

From the time Bernd Foerster came to K-State 13 years ago, he has been the dean for the College of Architecture and Design. Before that, he was at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y., for 17 years — serving his last two years as dean.

Foerster's plans for the future include "definitely staying here (at K-State) and going back to full-time teaching."

There were several reasons why Foerster decided to retire and his "love of teaching" was the primary reason, he said.

"I'm teaching some classes right now, but next spring after I take a semester break, I'll be teaching full-time," he said.

His involvement outside of the college also influenced his decision.

"There's a growing demand for my services in the community and on the state and national levels, and I wish to pursue these also," Foerster said.

In 1971, Donald Trotter was named dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine and has held the position for the past 13 years.

Koeppel said Trotter plans to stay on for a year. Trotter did not comment on his future plans.

Student Senate hears debate on button bill

Student senators may no longer be recognizable by their "senate buttons."

Last night, senators heard the first reading of a bill which would repeal a bill requiring them to wear identification buttons each Thursday.

The new bill, sponsored by Kay Deever, education senator, Brian O'Neill, graduate senator, and Diane Johnson, engineering senator, states "the Senator Identification Button has not promoted intercommunication with students, and in some cases, has discouraged such interaction."

"I have never been asked a question because I was wearing the button," Deever said.

Some senators asked if alternative forms of identification would be used if the button was no longer required.

"The intent of the bill is not to provide alternatives at this point, but to repeal a bill which is not serving its purpose," O'Neill said.

"We are simply saying the button bill isn't working," he said. Tim Ohlde, agriculture senator, questioned senators on student response to the button.

Approximately 20 senators indicated they were approached because they were wearing the button. In an unofficial count, 18 said they believed it had a negative effect on other students and 12 said they did not know if the buttons had an effect.

Kendra Ponte, arts and sciences senator, said the buttons would be useful after elections to help students identify new senators.

O'Neill said the new senate could pass a new button bill, if desired.

The bill will be voted on at the Senate meeting next Thursday.

he was afraid complications to the bill would create problems with the governor and Corrections Secretary Michael Barbara.

Hoagland said the corrections secretary does not want any restrictions on the program. He said he is afraid future legislation may not go through one of the houses, or that the governor may not sign it due to pressure from Barbara.

"If we want safeguards on the program, we must attach them now," Hoagland said.

Hoagland also criticized the entire plan as "a bad concept." He said the plan would take minimum-security inmates and put them in new areas.

Court denies death request

SAN FRANCISCO — The California Supreme Court on Thursday rejected a bid by cerebral palsy victim Elizabeth Bouvia for the right to starve herself to death while receiving pain-killers and hygienic care in a Riverside hospital.

In a brief order, with no comment, the entire court denied her request to overturn a lower court decision that prohibited Bouvia from starving herself to death at Riverside General Hospital while medical workers provide her with pain-killers and personal care to ease the pain of dying.

Spacelab astronauts tour Europe

VIENNA, Austria — Five astronauts who participated in last year's history-making Spacelab mission arrived Thursday on the first leg of a tour of 10 European countries which helped fund the flight.

Americans John Young, Robert Parker and Byron Lichtenberg, and Ulf Merbold of West Germany were on board the space shuttle flight. Wubbo Ockels of the Netherlands took part from mission control at Florida's Kennedy Space Center.

The 10 European countries invested nearly $1 billion to develop and build Spacelab, a cooperative venture between the European Space Agency and NASA, its American equivalent.

Spacelab was launched Nov. 28 and circled the globe 166 times before landing Dec. 8. More than 70 joint European-U.S. experiments were performed in space.

Merbold, the first non-American on a NASA flight, described the project shortly after arriving in Vienna as a "mission in the spirit of international brotherhood."

Young, the flight commander, told reporters the flight was "a symbol of international cooperation."

The four plan to fly today to Bremen, West Germany. They also are scheduled to visit Italy, France, Britain, Belgium, Spain, the Netherlands, Denmark and Switzerland.

Carter, Ford to urge public to vote

NEW YORK — Former presidents and political rivals Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford will be appearing on television — although not simultaneously — in a campaign to get out the vote.

They will be seen in ABC-TV's "Voting for Democracy" public service spots, intended to encourage turnout this fall.

Each ex-president wrote his own text. Ford, who lost to Carter in the 1976 election, said: "If you want democracy to work, you have to vote. It's just that simple."

Carter, who lost to Ronald Reagan in 1980, said, "Our participation on the local level will help shape what kind of nation we're going to have."

'Three's Company' cast to change

LOS ANGELES — "Three's Company" won't be much of a crowd next season, with the announcement that co-stars Joyce DeWitt, Priscilla Barnes, Don Knotts and Richard Kline are leaving the ABC-TV series.

John Ritter will be the only member of the cast to stay with the show when it returns next fall. The changes were announced Wednesday, and new cast members will be announced later.

School bus mishap prompts complaint

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

A complaint concerning a school bus accident was filed against the Junction City-Fort Riley Transit Company Thursday by Riley County Attorney Colt Knutson.

The company owns the bus that overturned on Riley County Highway 901 Jan. 12 while transporting U.S.D. 485 Junction City schoolchildren. A small fire broke out in the front of the bus and was extinguished by Don Shelton, a Manhattan resident who saw the accident from the highway.

Two people were injured in the accident. Bus driver Blenda M. Cill suffered shoulder injuries and Shane Melanie, a passenger on the bus, was treated for scalp lacerations.

"The charges are based on insufficient tire tread on one or more of the tires," Knutson said.

Sgt. Stan Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department quoted the report on the accident as saying the tires were "somewhat inadequate in tread depth."

"The law requires, among other things, that the tread have no less than one-sixteenth of an inch across adjacent tire grooves," Knutson said.

The Kansas State Highway Patrol is responsible for inspecting all state school buses prior to the beginning of school, Steve McCoy, highway patrol trooper, said.

Highway patrol area sergeant for Geary and Riley counties, Marvin LaFollette, said the bus was last inspected in late August.

"After the accident, the first thing I did was to go over to the patrol district and pull the file on it (the bus)," LaFollette said. "The vehicle was inspected by trooper Charles McWelle in the last part of August. The vehicle was not rejected at that time. We do not go back and inspect them."

David O'Neal, director of transportation for the Junction City School District, said the bus passed inspection on Aug. 17.

"No bus in Kansas is on route until it passes inspection," O'Neal said. "The indications are that the tires were short on tread — what criteria was used to make that determination I'm not sure. I do know that Junction City Transit is very conscious of these things, and if those tires were short of tread, I would be very surprised."

"There is no doubt in my mind that those tires were valid when it (the bus) was inspected," LaFollette said. "We're very hard-nosed about those inspections."

Knutson said there was no chance that a complaint would be filed against the highway patrol for allowing the bus to pass inspection.

"I don't know what the explanation is," he said. "Those buses put a lot of miles on (them)."

Knutson said another possible explanation for the poor quality of the tires was that a problem developed with the tires that were on the bus at the time of the inspection, and they were replaced by tires with inadequate tread.

Bar controversy wanes; institute awaits ruling

In the month that Charlie's Neighborhood Bar has been open, nobody living in the area has complained about its presence, said Charles Busch, owner of the establishment.

The controversy over the tavern's location at Claflin Road and Denison Avenue may not have died, however.

The Institute of Religion, 1820 Claflin, which is operated by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, is located just west of Firstbank Center where the bar is located. Institute officials have repeatedly voiced opposition to the tavern's being located close to the facility.

Manhattan city commissioners late last year approved a beer license for the bar, in effect stating that the institute doesn't constitute a school. If the city had considered the education center a school, the bar would have been too close to the building to have been issued a license.

Pending a decision by the church's legal department in Utah, the church may go to court over the matter, said Thomas K. Nelson, institute director.

A member of the Gamma Phi Beta Corp. board of directors, 1807 Todd Road, just north of the tavern, said the sorority board is opposed to the bar because of its location.

The member, who requested anonymity, said noise from people leaving the bar could disturb women sleeping in part of the house. The sorority also fears problems with trespassers, she said.

The board is working with Busch to have a fence built between the house and the bar to keep trespassers out, the member said.

Professors plan Soviet tour; students can acquire credit

A two-week study tour of the Soviet Union is being organized by two K-State professors — Robert Baumann, assistant professor of history, and Joseph Hajda, professor of political science.

Both professors have traveled in the Soviet Union and specialize in its history and affairs. Hajda has previously organized three similar tours to the Soviet Union through K-State.

The tour is scheduled for May 15 through 28, and anyone may participate. Students can get course credit for the tour. Estimated cost of the study tour from New York is $1,360.

In addition to the trip's "element of pure tourism and sight-seeing, it will also be an educational experience," Baumann said. "Generally, American people don't know much about the Soviet Union. It's good to get exposure, so that it's more of a real place — more of a reality. The Soviet Union is very important in the world scheme of things today — it's important that Americans become knowledgeable about it, firsthand, in addition to textbook learning."

"Through the press, the Soviets have developed a type of attitude toward Americans — they harbor suspicions, yet they also offer warm hospitality. It varies — they're curious, but they also want to back off."

Through a list of suggested readings they will circulate, Baumann and Hajda will prepare their tourists for "exploring on their own and mingling where tourists usually don't." They hope the supplemental readings and other advance preparations will "help them to translate their impressions," Baumann said.

Highlights will include visiting the Kremlin in Moscow, the St. Sophia Cathedral in Kiev, the Palaces of the Tsars and the Hermitage Art Museum in Leningrad and Helsinki, the capital of Finland.

"I would like to emphasize how much one can learn through this type of direct participation," Hajda said. "It's a great learning experience."

Civic theater play examines racism

By JOHN CREGO
Collegian Reviewer

Friendship between two men is not at all uncommon, even if one man is black and the other is white. What would make this friendship uncommon is to have it form in the racially tense atmosphere of South Africa during the early 1960s.

This friendship began when Piet Bezuidenhout, an Afrikan farmer, was forced because of drought to move into a city on the southeast coast of South Africa. After moving into Port Elizabeth, Piet met and married a white, English-speaking woman, Gladys Adams. After becoming involved in subversive political activities against the British government, Piet made close friends with a colored man, Steve Daniels. In South Africa, "colored" refers to a person of mixed race.

This sets the theme for the Manhattan Civic Theatre presentation of Athol Fugard's "A Lesson From Aloes." Winner of the New York Drama Critics Circle Award as best play of 1980-81, the work will be presented by the Manhattan Civic Theatre tonight and Saturday and Jan. 27 and 28.

As the play opens, Piet is busy with his aloes plants. He is trying to identify a species of the plant and decide if he has discovered a new species. But this is the least of his problems as his neurotic wife presents all kinds of reasons why the backyard supper that they have planned will be a disaster. The guests for the supper are to be Steve Daniels and his family. Drama is conflict, and as Steve shows up late to the supper, alone, this powerful, wordy drama about intimate relationships entwines the three people into an unsettled understanding of themselves.

Linda Haynes Uthoff, who plays the troubled Gladys, gives an excellent performance in this difficult role. Uthoff, who received a master's degree from K-State, is currently a special student in speech and a temporary speech instructor. She is well-known to Manhattan audiences from numerous roles in K-State productions and as Abby in Manhattan Civic Theatre's production of "Desire Under the Elms."

In the role of Piet, David J. Cox, head of the Department of Biochemistry, offers a very believable portrayal of a man who has to deal with a seemingly unsolvable problem with his wife and the guilt he carries because of Steve's former imprisonment.

In this production, Steve is played by Larry Nicholson. This play is the first production in which Nicholson has ever appeared on stage. Nevertheless, despite opening-night butterflies and an injured knee from a fall on the ice, he gives a fine performance of a man whose country has penalized him for being a black activist. His friendship with Piet has become "rotten with doubt", although he tries to deny the fact his friend could have betrayed him.

Tamara Compton designed the sets and directed "A Lesson From Aloes". Her use of the limited space that is available for staging was handled very well. With very few exceptions, the stage movements and blocking of the actors was very easy to follow. Tamara portrays a feeling of reality through her actors that adds to a fine evening of entertainment.

Piet pours wine for Steve as Gladys looks on, moments before he proposes a toast to friendship.

Production utilizes University talent

By JOHN CREGO
Collegian Reviewer

K-State can be proud of the Manhattan Civic Theatre's production of "A Lesson From Aloes," a play by South African Athol Fugard. The University is represented in the cast and crew by a department head, a graduate with a master's degree in speech, a graduate student and a former student.

David J. Cox, head of the Department of Biochemistry and one of the play's lead actors, had only limited acting experience while in college. Since becoming involved with the Manhattan Civic Theatre, he has appeared in several productions and portrayed Charles Dickens in the 1982 presentation of "A Christmas Carol."

Linda Haynes Uthoff, who shares the lead with Cox in "A Lesson From Aloes," received her master's degree from K-State after completing her undergraduate degree in education at the University of Kansas. Uthoff is a special student in speech and currently a temporary instructor in the speech department. She worked her way through undergraduate school as a singer and dancer at Worlds of Fun near Kansas City, Mo. Uthoff also worked in professional summer stock at Music Theater of Wichita, where she performed with professionals from the New York stage.

Tamara Compton, the play's director, is a graduate student in speech. She received her bachelor's degree in theater from the University of California at Santa Barbara. Compton was business manager for the Circle and Square Theatre in New York, stage manager for The Arena Stage in Washington, D.C., and assistant production manager for the Denver Civic Theatre Company. She was also general manager for the San Diego Repertory Theatre.

Larry Nicholson, another member of the cast, attended K-State in the early 1970s. He majored in history and political science and also played football. Nicholson is currently director of the Douglass Center.

"A Lesson from Aloes" was Nicholson's first stage appearance.

Mummenshantz mime troupe: more than just white faces

By ANGIE SCHARNHORST
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Take three speechless performers, add amusing body shapes, fantastic costumes and a performance of 40 masked vignettes, and you have Mummenshantz, a Swiss mime troupe which will appear tonight in McCain Auditorium.

The mimes who comprise Mummenshantz (named for "mummen," meaning "game" and "shantz," meaning "chance") transform themselves intermittently into blobs resembling mushrooms, vacuum tubes, caterpillars and parachutes. The troupe readily incorporates the use of masks into its performance. Occasionally, the three members are enclosed in the same mask.

Mummenshantz has undergone several cast changes since it was begun in Europe nearly 10 years ago. The current members, Italian Lydia Biondi, Swiss Peter Gerber and Mexican Alejandro Moran, have retained the group's tradition. Mummenshantz was one of many troupes in Europe to have broken out of the mold of white-faced mime, and has been recognized as one of the foremost performing troupes.

The key to Mummenshantz's popularity and success, according to former member Andres Brossard, is its deviation from traditional white-face techniques.

"The mask conveys much more than white-face, since expression comes from the whole, the middle," Brossard said in an article in Dramatics Magazine in 1978. "White-face is really moving away, hiding."

The current members have been together since August, 1982.

Biondi began her professional career as a classical dancer and was later drawn toward experimental theater. She performed with such avant-garde companies as Bussotti, Alvin Curran and Music Viva. Biondi appeared on television and in theaters throughout Germany, Switzerland and Italy before helping start a mime school in Rome. In recent years she has alternated between teaching, acting and mime and has appeared in several films.

Raised in Switzerland, Peter Gerber began his performing arts work as a set designer and stage manager in a children's theater in Zurich. He later became production stage manager for the international touring company of Mummenshantz. During his two years in that position, Gerber attended intensive workshops in mime and acrobatics, which led to his joining Mummenshantz.

Alejandro Moran was born in Mexico City, where he received his first training in theater at the National Institute of Fine Arts. After studying in Paris at the Theatre and Movement School of Jacques Lecoq — a premier instructor in non-traditional mime — he returned to the institute as an actor and teacher. As a former classmate in Paris of the Mummenshantz creators, Moran was called to join the international company in 1982.

'Cats gun for first Big Eight win

K-State to tangle with Tisdale-led Sooners

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

The K-State Wildcats will be trying to prove that the third time is a charm as they host the University of Oklahoma Sooners Saturday afternoon at Ahearn Field House.

In last season's two meetings with the Sooners, the 'Cats were beaten by two points on last-second shots — both by sophomore Wayman Tisdale.

Tisdale hit on a five-foot baseline turn-around jumper with two seconds remaining, to stop the 'Cats 64-62 in their initial meeting in Ahearn last season. Then, as if to prove the first time was no fluke, Tisdale sank a 10-foot jumper with five seconds left to beat the 'Cats in Norman, 72-70.

This year's Sooner squad will have a much different look than the one K-State played last season. Oklahoma lost four starters to graduation — David Little, Chucky Barnett, Bo Overton and Charles Jones — from last year's squad, which finished second in the Big Eight Conference with a 10-4 record and was 24-9 overall.

The new-look Sooners have gotten off to a fast start, compiling a 14-2 record, and are the conference's only nationally ranked team. Freshman guard Tim McCalister has provided much of the 'Wayman Tisdale is almost a phenomenon.'

— Jack Hartman

Sooner's outside scoring, averaging more than 18 points per game and, aside from Tisdale, is the team's only double-figure scorer. Senior guard Jan Pannell is handing out a league-leading 6.9 assists per game.

The Sooner's main gun remains the 6-foot-9, All-American Tisdale. Tisdale leads the Big Eight in scoring, 29.7 per contest, and rebounding, 11.6 per game.

K-State head coach Jack Hartman thinks highly of the young man from Tulsa, Okla.

"It's a disadvantage knowing what that guy can do. I think he's the best player in college basketball. Wayman Tisdale is almost a phenomenon. And he's a great, great young man along with that," said Hartman, who coached Tisdale last summer at the Pan American games.

Oklahoma is coming off a 100-89, double-overtime victory over the University of Colorado which occurred Wednesday night in Boulder.

Tisdale scored 36, senior forward Calvin Pierce chipped in 22 and McCalister added 20 in the game which ended in a dispute.

'I think he's the best player in college basketball.'

— Jack Hartman

Oklahoma called a timeout with nine seconds left; when play resumed, the Sooner players gathered at midcourt to trade insults with the Colorado fans. Oklahoma Head Coach Billy Tubbs made an obscene gesture to the crowd and was greeted with a hail of debris. As the Sooners left the court, they began throwing the objects back into the crowd.

The Wildcats are coming off a tough two-point loss on the road to the Cowboys of Oklahoma State University, 60-58.

The 'Cats, who never led in the contest, trailed by as many as 10 points in the second half, but managed to knot the score at 52 with just over three minutes left. Four Oklahoma State free throws in the final 39 seconds made the difference.

The 'Cats were led by junior Eddie Elder, who scored 16 points and hauled in 12 rebounds. Freshman Alex Williams added 14 points and junior Tom Alfaro came off the bench to add 12.

Hartman holds a career 17-17 record against Oklahoma, but is 12-3 versus the Sooners in Ahearn. Oklahoma has won five of the last eight meetings between the two schools.

The University of Oklahoma's Wayman Tisdale will be a formidable obstacle facing K-State in the Wildcat's quest for victory in their Big Eight home opener Saturday afternoon in Ahearn Field House. The 'Cats hope to raise their conference record to 1-1 and 9-6 overall.

microscopes were purchased for the laboratory as well as a fitron cycle, an exercise bicycle, for the physical therapy department.

Electronic thermometers, weight scales, audio visual equipment, lights for the examination tables, CPR mannequins and a steam-action vacuum cleaner are some of the other purchases made with the donated funds.

Tout said that without the money from the donation, many of the purchases would not have been made.

"We planned on a lot of things, but we probably would not have purchased them, or they would have been purchased piece meal," he said.

None of the money was spent on luxury items, Tout said.

"The purchase of the equipment in the lab allows us to do more testing with less chance of any error," he said. "It speeds up the reports, and they are very accurate. It also allowed us to improve our patient flow by cutting down on the waiting time of a lot of students."

The examination table purchased replaced a table that was used when surgery was performed at Lafene.

"The exam table replaced an old antique operating table," Tout said. "There were certain positions you couldn't use, and we needed a table you could raise or lower. When you sewed somebody up, you had to nearly break your back."

The new table is mobile, and the height can be adjusted. Tout said the old table would be put in an area that displays other antique equipment.

Tout said he believed the remodeling also was necessary.

"You're more receptive to what you're told to do if you're in an environment that is pleasing to you," Tout said. "If you're in a dirty, beaten down office, you may think you're getting dirty, beaten down medical care."

Students have seemed to notice the changes in Lafene.

"A secretary told me this morning that a student said, 'Oh my, what a clean building,'" Tout said. "It's much more pleasant and much quieter because we added carpeting."

control, and insofar as the two talks covering nuclear issues are concerned, I have nothing positive to report to you."

NATO sources in Stockholm said one possible policy shift for Gromyko involved combining and renaming the two presently suspended nuclear weapons talks. But the Soviets have not made up their minds on the continuation of the talks, the sources said.

The sources said the indications came in meetings Gromyko held Wednesday with Shultz and West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

Pickup hits side of garage

A Manhattan man remained in The Saint Mary Hospital overnight for treatment of unspecified injuries he received when his pickup truck smashed into the side of a garage about 11:30 p.m. Thursday at 701 Canfield Dr.

Stacey M. Launchbaugh, 2208 Green Ave., who police said was celebrating his 18th birthday, was charged with driving left of center and driving faster than reasonable and prudent after his vehicle crashed into the garage owned by David L. Adams.

Adams, associate professor of journalism and mass communications and director of Student Publications, was with his family in Kansas City, Mo., attending a concert when the accident occurred and could not be reached for comment.

Launchbaugh's car apparently crossed the centerline of Anderson Avenue, entered Adams' yard destroying a hedgerow and struck the garage twice, the second time plunging through the south wall and damaging a vehicle parked inside, police said.

No arrest had been made early this morning, police said, but a blood sample to determine whether Launchbaugh was intoxicated was ordered to be taken at the hospital.

About a year and a half ago, Adams' hedgerow and fence were damaged in a similar accident.

Colleges recognize dedicated students

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Once a month during the academic year a small, silver display case in Bluemont Hall is opened. Inside the case hangs the picture and biography of the College of Education Student of the Month.

The 2-year-old award, sponsored by the Education Council, is designed to recognize students who are involved in education in a variety of ways and who are performing well academically.

"The Student of the Month might be involved in public speaking, Education Council, Student National Education Association (SNEA), or in their academic area, fraternity, sorority or dorm," said Paul Burden, head of the College of Education Student of the Month selection committee and an associate professor of curriculum and instruction.

"Not all of these students have a 4.0 grade average. Some students may have a lower grade point average, but are chosen for their outstanding achievement," Burden said.

Those chosen as Student of the Month must first be nominated by fellow students, faculty, or the students themselves before they are considered by the selection committee.

All nominations are then passed on to the selection committee and announced at the first of the month.

The committee consists of two faculty members, two student representatives, and a member of the student personnel office.

"We just want to say, 'There's something special about this person,'" Burden said.

"The display and publication draws a lot of deserved attention to the student," he said.

Each Student of the Month is introduced to the College of Education faculty at their monthly meeting. The College of Education newsletter, "The Chalkboard", also carries news of the winner. Selected students are eligible for the Student of the Year award and a $100 prize to be used for school supplies, but the winners are under no obligation.

"It really meant a lot to be recognized," said Kellie Sanders, senior in speech and theater education and December 1983 winner. "Recognition doesn't come often enough for students."

Though recognition is an acknowledged benefit of becoming Student of the Month, Alice Bertels, senior in Elementary Education and April 1983 winner, said she believes the effects of the award are far more reaching.

"I felt if I was recognized, then things I was interested in would interest someone else and they would come and ask me about them. It might open up those avenues to them and make them aware," Bertels said.

"It does help you," she said, referring to using the award when looking for a job. "It is something people respect and recognize. It lets others know you aren't just one in a crowd. I have put it down (on job applications) and I think it has helped," she said.

Students of the College of Education are not the only ones who are rewarded for their involvement and high academic achievement. Four other colleges offer the same or comparable awards.

Student of the Semester is given by the College of Home Economics to an outstanding student involved in activities who displays a high GPA.

Karen Pence, instructor of home economics, said she thinks the award is a quality indicator.

"It might illustrate to an employer what type of person he is getting," Pence said. "But the value an employer puts on the award is up to the individual employer."

The College of Agriculture gives the Student of the Month award based on high grade point and involvement in various activities on or off campus.

"I feel it is an excellent award because it recognizes students who are involved in many ways," Larry Erpelding said. Erpelding is associate director of resident college instruction for the College of Agriculture.

"It is the kind of award that carries weight and is good to have on a resume," Erpelding said.

The College of Engineering chooses approximately 30 students a year known as the Knights of St. Patrick.

"The students are picked according to their grade point, leadership in various extra-curricular activities and recommendation from different departments," John Dollar, assistant dean of engineering, said.

"What the award really amounts to is to show that you are a student leader," Dollar said.

A Student of the Semester is chosen by the Arts and Sciences College to recognize a student who has exemplified the best in liberal arts.

"The list of past students are virtually a who's who of students in the college. Their achievements in college and their interesting pursuits outside of college make them special," said Kent Cartwright, assistant dean of the College of the Arts and Sciences.

EPA asbestos regulation weak, agency reports

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — An internal report by the Environmental Protection Agency says a federal regulation that school officials check their buildings for asbestos hazards is not working. The Kansas City Star said Thursday in a copyright story.

The Star said the report, prepared at EPA headquarters in Washington, D.C., indicates the program to protect school children and teachers from asbestos hazards has suffered from EPA failure to give the program a high priority.

Asbestos is a brittle mineral used widely as an insulator in building materials, automotive brakes and other products. It has been linked to lung disease and cancer in heavily exposed industrial workers, and no level of exposure is known to be safe.

The EPA's main tool in dealing with school asbestos hazards is a 1982 rule requiring officials of the nation's 122,000 public and private elementary and secondary schools to search their buildings for damaged insulation or other materials that could release asbestos fibers.

If asbestos was found in the materials, the schools' officials were to disclose its location to parents, teachers and custodians and give custodians advice on how to avoid disturbing it. School officials had until June to comply with the rule, which does not require that corrective work be done.

The Star said the EPA report said 190 of the first 275 school systems checked since June for compliance with the rule were in violation of one or more provisions. The report noted that inspectors generally selected school districts suspected of non-compliance, which could make the problem look worse than it is.

"The parents of students exposed are in many cases unaware of the existence of such a hazard," the report said.

Shultz says informal arms talks 'pretty good'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George P. Shultz said Sunday the United States and Soviet Union are conducting "pretty good" informal arms limitation discussions and could resume conventional force reduction talks March 16.

Shultz did not reveal the exact issues involved in the informal discussions, but he said Americans should "take heart" because the Reagan administration's military buildup has diminished the threat of nuclear war.

"We have pretty good discussions going on now on the hot line," he said on "This Week with David Brinkley" on ABC-TV. "That's a form of arms agreement."

Shultz said the United States is agreeable to a Soviet suggestion that the two superpowers resume in Vienna March 16 their suspended Mutual and Balanced Force Reduction talks aimed at trimming conventional forces in Europe.

But Shultz moved away from the long-standing Reagan administration theory that the placement of U.S. Cruise and Pershing II missiles in Western Europe would pressure the Soviets into serious talks about limiting the spread of intermediate-range nuclear devices.

Asked to characterize U.S.-Soviet relations, he replied: "There are some positive things. There are some negative things. It's kind of a mixed picture."

Nevertheless, Shultz said, "the American people should take heart" because a stronger United States is in a better negotiating position.

Asked whether the threat of nuclear war has diminished, he said: "Yes, I think so. I think deterrent strength diminishes the temptation of somebody to use their strength against you."

On another matter, Shultz did not discount the possibility of a pre-emptive U.S. strike against terrorists in the Middle East. Administration officials say U.S. intelligence has evidence that suspected anti-American terrorists in Lebanon and Iran have or will soon have access to small planes that could be used to fly kamikaze strikes against U.S. warships in the Mediterranean and Persian Gulf.

"It's not involving ourselves deeper in a Middle Eastern war to defend ourselves and our citizens against these tactics of terrorism," Shultz said.

"These tactics are aimed at America generally...but it is going to individuals and it's going to organized governments. It involves not just us but others, and it's an attack on civilization," he said.

Appearing earlier on the same program, Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's national security adviser, said he was not concerned about cool Soviet-U.S. relations because, considering their rivalry, "it is quite normal."

Brzezinski accused the Soviets of creating "artificially an atmosphere of crisis. I think the crisis is a hoax, and it's also a Soviet tactic, and we should not succumb to that."

He said he thought the United States should pick up on a Soviet proposal to limit nuclear launch vehicles to 1,800. The United States should make a counter offer to limit warheads to 7,500, about 500 below current levels.

"I think we could have an arms control agreement of this type in five months," said Brzezinski, who stressed that the United States should be seeking simple interim agreements rather than comprehensive treaties.

U.S. attorney announces resignation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — William French Smith, the multimillionaire corporate lawyer who directed sweeping changes in the Department of Justice and served as a close personal adviser to President Reagan, has resigned as attorney general, administration sources said Sunday.

The sources, who sought anonymity, said it appeared that a leading candidate to succeed Smith is presidential counselor Edwin Meese III.

They said Smith was not pressured to leave but had simply decided that after three years in office it was time to go. They said he felt that he had accomplished his major goals.

One source said Reagan's expected re-election campaign influenced Smith's decision. The source noted Smith was active behind the scenes in every Reagan campaign and wanted to do so again but felt it would be inappropriate if he remained as attorney general.

The 66-year-old Smith, who reversed civil rights, antitrust and criminal enforcement policies that stood through four previous administrations, kept his plans secret almost to the last minute.

The sources said he told Reagan in a one-on-one meeting in the Oval Office Wednesday. But even by Sunday, Smith had not advised his assistants at the department of his plans. And the reports of his resignation caught even some of Smith's closest friends by surprise.

During the Oval Office meeting, Reagan told Smith, who was Reagan's personal lawyer for many years, that the Cabinet post was his as long as he wanted it, the sources said.

Reagan, returning to the White House from his Maryland mountain-top retreat in time to watch the Super Bowl on television, dodged reporters' questions about Smith and any successor. The sources said they expected Reagan to formally announce the resignation Monday.

Meese was out of town Sunday and could not be reached for comment.

One sign of Smith's influence on Reagan came in the appointment of Sandra Day O'Connor as the first woman to the Supreme Court. She was Smith's choice, and sources said then that he prevailed over the president's closest White House aides whose first choice was a man.

Ex-department head testifies against Mahaffey

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

The appeal hearing for fired tenured associate professor Ben Mahaffey slowly progressed Friday with the continued testimony of Harold Gallaher, former head of the Department of Forestry.

Gallaher, who testified for about two hours Thursday and about six hours Friday, said students were afraid to attend Mahaffey's classes.

One former student of Mahaffey's came to him (Gallaher) in tears and said if the associate professor of forestry was not dismissed, she would be forced to change majors, Gallaher said.

"The thing I came away with (from a meeting with the student) was that (she) was very afraid for herself," Gallaher said. "She was physically afraid of the man. She did not want to attend his class or even meet him in the hall."

That same student said all of the students in the natural resource management curriculum in the forestry department were afraid of Mahaffey, he said.

But Mahaffey's lawyer, David Schauer, questioned the validity Gallaher placed on the student's complaint. Gallaher admitted he had never met the student before, but chose to believe her complaint even though Mahaffey had been in the forestry department for some time.

Another former student told Gallaher that Mahaffey had made him the class "goat," telling him he was dumb and stupid. That student also claimed Mahaffey made vulgar statements during classroom lectures. Mahaffey denied that accusation.

"The main thing I wanted at the time (after the meeting with the second student) was a meeting with Dr. Mahaffey," Gallaher said. But Mahaffey said he couldn't meet because he was busy preparing for one of his grievance hearings.

Gallaher said the three grievances Mahaffey filed for unfair faculty evaluations and merit pay increases amounted to virtually nothing.

"There was nothing accomplished by the grievances. They changed absolutely nothing," he said. "There was no change in Dr. Mahaffey's attitude. There was only one problem in the Department of Forestry and that was Dr. Mahaffey."

The first student complaint about the professor came in fall 1978, Gallaher said, but no more were registered until fall 1980, when five more were made.

For 1978 faculty evaluations, Mahaffey was the only forestry department faculty member to have the area of "classroom environment" added to his evaluation — for which he received a "poor" rating, Gallaher said. For "enthusiasm" he received an "excellent."

Gallaher retired in June 1981 for what he said were various reasons — the Mahaffey controversy included.

"It just seemed like the right opportunity. It (the controversy) played a role in my departure. I don't know what role," Gallaher said. "I didn't enjoy my work as I had in the past. Some of my work had become a chore."

The hearing begins again at 9 a.m. today in Union 212 and is open to the public.

Students write-off debts, credit

Nearly 20 percent of all bad checks in Riley County are written by K-State students, said William Kennedy III, assistant county attorney.

"When they (students) write a bad check, they are in danger of giving themselves a criminal record," Kennedy said. "It's a type of record that indicates they can't be counted on."

Writing a bad check is not theft — according to the law, it's fraud, he said. A check is a promise to the merchant by the maker of the check that there are sufficient funds to cover the amount of the check.

If the check bounces, the merchant notifies the maker that payment is to be made. If payment is still not made, the merchant sends a certified letter to the maker allowing seven days to make payment, Kennedy said.

At this point, the merchant has made a case against the maker of the check, he said.

If payment has not been made after seven days, the merchant presents its case to the county attorney's office. Kennedy said the county attorney's office sends a letter to the maker requesting payment within 10 days.

Following the 10-day period, an arrest warrant is issued for the maker of the bad check, who is taken to jail and required to bond out, he said.

Within a day or so of bonding out, the defendant is taken to court, advised of his rights and given a date to come before the court.

Because of the number of bad check cases brought to the county attorney's office, a new policy was created to charge the defendant court costs of $84 at the time the warrant is issued.

The defendant may also be required to pay a bank fee for writing the bad check and a percentage of his bond.

Prime Minister Gandhi blasts U.S. for double standard toward India

By The Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Prime Minister Indira Gandhi says America cultivates dictatorships around the world while displaying indifference and a double standard toward India.

"They don't seem to be bothered about India," Gandhi told The Associated Press during a weekend interview.

Gandhi, who has pursued traditionally close Indian relations with the Soviet Union, also denied that India is dependent on arms from the Soviet Union, its major foreign supplier.

"When we need it and we get it on attractive terms, we take it, but it's not binding us in any way..." she said. India recently moved to diversity, buying arms from Britain, France and West Germany.

"I don't want to be sounding as if I am anti-U.S., because I am not at all," said the 66-year-old leader of some 700 million Indians.

"...But you see, the administration talks of democracy but actually whom does it help?...The majority are not democratic. They help dictatorships of one kind or another."

Asked if by dictatorships she meant countries such as Pakistan, the Philippines and South Korea, which received U.S. aid, Gandhi said yes: "And in Africa also you know, Latin America and so on."

She said she and other government leaders are frustrated "that we're trying to keep our country democratic, but what do you get for it in terms of better relations with the Western democracies?"

Gandhi, who also heads the 100-country group of non-aligned nations, said good relations with President Reagan and Britain's Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher are "personal. From the point of view of policy...their views are entirely opposed to ours."

Gandhi restated her objections to the U.S. shipment of arms to neighboring Pakistan. She said that in some areas, Pakistan is "about a decade ahead" of India in weaponry.

"We can't possibly object to America...giving Pakistan what it is in need of," she said, "but we feel they are being armed to an extent which is well beyond their need..."

"They say it's because of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, but the guns are pointing toward us and not to Afghanistan."

Gandhi said a major problem in India-U.S. relations is the American effort to reduce donations to international credit institutions: "It seems to be done in a way that hits India."

She said the United States supported China's entry into the International Development Association, creating additional demands on the institution, which lends money to the world's poorest countries.

At the same time, she said, U.S. plans to cut its contributions to the association by 25 percent, and "therefore the amount available has to be divided so it's India's assistance that is to be cut."

Six persons are finalists for being K-State's 1984 "Classified Employee of the Year."

They are R. Dean Harris, agricultural technician, Garden City Branch Experiment Station, eight years of service; Connie Kisse, clerk III, Division of Continuing Education, 10 years; and Lois Lewis, extension nutritional assistant I, Shawnee County Extension Office, nine years.

Also Reba Snively, personnel officer II, University Facilities support services, 12 years; Bonnie Stone, food service supervisor II, Department of Housing, 11 years; and Billie Tunison, clerk III, Department of English, 22 years.

Survey reports teacher shortage

Kansas is short of teachers in mathematics, bilingual education and physics.

There is a surplus of teachers in driver education, health education and physical education.

That is what James Akin, associate director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, learned through a state survey in which 22 Kansas educational placement officers participated.

Since 1976, Akin has conducted a national survey of job opportunities for the Association for School, College and University Staffing (ASCUS) organization, and he has complemented this with a "Kansas Report" since 1980.

In Kansas, students preparing to teach who graduate this May can expect about the same kind of job opportunities as last year's graduates found. Nationally, the most optimism in the teacher job market is in the south central part of the nation; the least optimism is in the northeast (New England).

Willard Hall labs pose health hazards

By KIMBERLY STOLLE
Collegian Reporter

Like many other university chemistry laboratories across the nation, the laboratories in Willard Hall pose health risks to students who use them because they don't meet the general requirements for safe laboratory environments.

Willard, home of K-State's Department of Chemistry since 1938, is a hazard because of its poor air ventilation, which doesn't guarantee removal of toxic fumes, lack of a smoke alarm system and serious power problems, Kenneth Klabunde, head of the chemistry department, said.

"We have been very worried about accidents with undergraduates and graduate students, and because our facility is not as good as it should be — in terms of air handling, fire alarms, and so on — we are even more worried than most chemistry laboratories," Klabunde said.

College laboratories across the nation face dangers of laboratory experiments because of poor safety conditions in laboratories and lack of instruction to students about safety practices. In January, a California student suffered a severed neck artery when a glass flask burst and sent glass throughout the laboratory, according to a story by the College Press Service.

Many universities are facing lawsuits filed by students who have been injured in laboratory accidents.

Although there have been several accidents in Willard since Klabunde's arrival four and a half years ago, none have led to serious injury. He said all of the accidents which have occurred within the past four years have been caused by student error, often aggravated by the poor facilities.

With the awareness of the lacking facilities, the chemistry department faculty and staff practice caution in the laboratories, Klabunde said. Graduate students who assist in the laboratories are required to participate in a teacher's training course where safety methods are stressed.

Students are required to purchase and use safety glasses. They are also instructed on basic safety practices through a lecture. Nevertheless, the dangers remain, Klabunde said.

"It's (safety hazards) a constant worry. We pay a lot of attention to it, and we're very worried about it," Klabunde said.

Despite the dangers chemical experiments present, Klabunde said he believes in the need of chemistry and laboratory experiments.

"Some people may ask 'Why do we spend so much time and take the risks involved in studying chemistry?' The reason is that chemistry has turned out to be one of the most important subjects. We live in a chemical age now, rather than a nuclear age," Klabunde said.

Klabunde also said the need for chemistry has become a basic need like that of English and mathematics.

"We must study chemistry, it's a central science. Now if we're going to do that — handling chemicals — there's some risk involved. That risk must be minimized," Klabunde said.

Due to the seriousness of the Willard laboratory conditions, the K-State administration, Board of Regents and the Kansas Legislature have agreed to replace Willard in a two-phase plan, he said.

In about three years, Phase I — moving the laboratories to King Hall — will begin.

Phase II will continue the addition to King until the entire chemistry department is located there, Klabunde said. Willard would then be converted into a classroom building, possibly housing the College of Business Administration.

Tri-Sig house to open for fall semester

Members of the Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority expect their new house to be completed in August, Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

Selection of an architectural design has been made and was presented to the sorority members Thursday night. Construction is scheduled to begin March 1, Robel said.

The sorority currently is completing financing arrangements. Local alumna are contributing a majority of the money for the construction, and the sorority's national headquarters is also providing funding. The estimated cost of the house is $800,000, Robel said.

The house will be located on the corner of Denison Avenue and Jardine Terrace. The city owns these streets, so the structure will be considered off-campus housing, as are all other greek houses in Manhattan, she said.

Job market improves for '84 graduates

By The College Press Service

The class of 1984 will enjoy one of the most dramatic upturns in the job market in recent history, according to two recently released national studies.

After several years of dismal employment conditions for the nation's college graduates, it appears job offers, as well as salaries, will be up significantly this spring.

"At the B.A. level, things are going to be up about 20 percent," said Victor Lindquist, placement chief at Northwestern University and author of that school's Endicott Report on the national job market.

"For the first time in several years, we're starting to see an increase in the number of jobs for college graduates," said Jack Shingleton, Michigan State University's placement director and supervisor of its annual jobs forecast.

Although MSU's study is noticeably more conservative — Shingleton expects only a 5 percent increase in the number of job offers — both jobs forecasts expect 1984 graduates to fare far better than their predecessors in 1982 and 1983.

"The market overall is bouncing back from this two-year decline we've been going through," Lindquist said.

Besides the predicted 20 percent increase in job opportunities for four-year graduates, "the market will also be strong at the master's level — up about 28 percent over last year," Lindquist said.

"The largest increase in all areas is at the master's level in engineering," he said. "The 'double E' (electrical engineering) degree is going to be the crown prince — up 28 percent over last year — along with degrees in the computer science area."

Shingleton said he thinks those figures may be too optimistic, but agreed that "demand is stronger," and that "the curve is moving in a positive direction for a change."

"There will be a heavy emphasis on electrical engineering and computer science majors," he said,

"although chemical and petroleum engineers will have a more difficult time this year."

The upturn has been coming gradually. In August 1983, College Press Service reported a growing sense of optimism among campus placement directors that the end of the recession and the coming of an election year signaled better times ahead for collegiate job seekers.

In an October 1983 CPS article, both Shingleton and Lindquist accurately predicted the upbeat results of their 1984 jobs forecasts.

Geographically, Shingleton said, the Southwest, Southeast and South central sections of the country will have the best job opportunities. The Northeast, Midwest and Northwest regions will be the worst areas for job seekers.

According to the MSU study, electrical engineers will have the highest starting salaries, $26,643, of all four-year grads. Starting salaries for agriculture and marketing majors will hover near $17,500, and accounting majors can expect to earn about $18,600.

Education majors at $14,779, and human ecology graduates, at $13,917, have the dubious distinction of being the lowest-paid majors for the coming year.

Even with their rosy predictions for the coming year, however, both studies caution that graduates will still have plenty of competition for job openings.

"It's still a buyer's market," Lindquist warned. "It will be very competitive, and if students are going to be successful, they'll have to be aggressive in their search."

While the market may look brighter for graduates with master's and bachelor's degrees, Ph.D.'s may have a harder time than ever finding employment.

A new Princeton University report predicts that there will be three times as many Ph.D.'s flooding the academic job market as there are jobs available for them.

Businesses increase interview schedule

The job market for 1984 graduates is better this year than in past years, according to two recent local employment studies.

Bruce Laughlin, director of K-State's Career Planning and Placement Center, agrees with this prediction.

He said some companies that previously only recruited students for job in the fall are returning for more interviews this spring. There are approximately 200 businesses scheduled for interviews this spring at the center. Laughlin said that figure does not include companies that conduct interviews off campus.

Graduates with degrees in electrical engineering, accounting and computer science will be in high demand this spring, but Laughlin said no area should be thought of as "bad."

In recent years there has been a surge in defense-related fields. Laughlin said the local defense industries are hiring quite heavily now. Defense-related organizations which have appointments on campus this spring will be interviewing students with majors in biochemistry, chemical science, physics, microbiology, all engineering fields, geophysics, computer science and electronics.

"The right curriculum does not guarantee you a job," Laughlin said. "Curriculum is only one of them (qualifications) that will get you a job. It seems many, many times students treat their degrees as an inoculation against unemployment."

Laughlin said students must be able to sell themselves during interviews. The first initial contact between a student and a company is now made with a resume instead of in person due to the new interviewing system implemented last year at the center. Employers choose students to interview before they visit campus by reading applicants' resumes or data sheets supplied by the center. Laughlin the system is more effective for both the interviewers and students.

Faculty member travels to El Salvador

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

The recent proposals forwarded by the Kissinger Commission following its fact-finding mission into El Salvador are a pipe dream, said Jan Flora, associate professor of sociology and anthropology.

Flora was the member of another fact-finding group that toured El Salvador earlier this month.

The group consisted of 18 university professors, religious leaders and lawyers from across the United States. The group spent ten days in early January in El Salvador and Nicaragua to examine the state of education and human rights in the two countries.

Flora said he ended the visit rather skeptical of the proposals forwarded by the Kissinger party. The Kissinger Commission report called for an approximate doubling of both military and economic aid to El Salvador over the next two years.

Flora said he sees problems in increasing aid while cracking down on Salvadoran military death squads.

"I'm skeptical about the commitment of our government to increase aid while pressuring the Salvadorian military to remove the death squads," he said.

The death squads assassinated 4,638 civilians in the first 11 months of 1983, according to Tutela Legal, the human rights organization of the archbishopric of San Salvador. Another 888 persons were initially reported missing, 374 of whom were discovered in jail. The remaining 514 are assumed to have disappeared.

One of the reasons Flora said he is not optimistic about the commitment of the U.S. government to El Salvador is that the American Embassy in El Salvador uses information from local newspapers in compiling its death totals.

"The embassy understands that Tutela Legal is the best source, but uses information from Salvadorian newspapers instead," he said. "The papers get their information from the armed forces press office, and thus the U.S. government claims only one-half as many deaths have taken place as a result of death squad activity."

"There are probably more people who are dying as a result of assassinations and other death squad killings than are dying in the war zone."

Flora took a trip with an American reporter into territory held by guerilla forces and said he saw some interesting things.

"When we got about five kilometers from the Honduran border, we met a man with a gun in his belt stopping buses. He was giving a 10-minute talk as to why people should join forces with him," Flora said. "At the end (of his talk) he half-apologetically asked for money, and he even gave a woman change."

Flora said his trip behind guerilla lines served to strengthen his belief that a negotiated settlement is the only reasonable course of action that could be taken.

"I believe it is the only real option to end the war, but the proposals of the Kissinger Commission have left me very pessimistic. There is no talk whatsoever of a negotiated settlement," he said.

"What the Kissinger group proposes is a pipe dream. We are gradually being sucked into a situation we shouldn't be involved in."

Camera ban should be removed

University officials did the public a disservice last week when they banned the use of cameras at the dismissal hearing of Ben Mahaffey, tenured associate professor of forestry.

One of the only photographs taken of the hearing was published on the front page of Wednesday's Manhattan Mercury. The picture, shot from outside the hearing room door, showed several participants in the proceedings, including Mahaffey. It also showed a K-State Police Department officer making a vain attempt to block the photographer's shot.

Photographers may soon be allowed in all Kansas courtrooms. The state Supreme Court in December authorized an experiment allowing cameras and tape recorders in four Kansas judicial districts.

After a similar experiment earlier in the high court and the Kansas Court of Appeals, the court voted to allow cameras in the state appellate courts.

Although the Mahaffey hearing is not an actual trial, the actions of state courts should be taken as an example for the University to follow.

One of the major differences between the Mahaffey hearing and the state's judicial system is one of organization.

The University, showing poor foresight, had no hearing procedure for dismissing tenured faculty prior to the Mahaffey case. Once the procedure policy was established, a clearly written statement should have been included about press coverage. The state court system has done a commendable job of keeping itself organized, reacting to the changes of time.

University officials' argument that the Mahaffey hearing is a personnel matter and thus justifies the exclusion of cameras and tape recorders isn't logical, considering the fact that reporters are allowed to take notes. Now that the University has a procedure for dealing with the firing of tenured personnel, it is time for the photography issue to be settled once and for all.

Cameras — one still and one video — should be allowed at all hearings of this type, including the remainder of the Mahaffey proceedings.

Tension rises after assassination

It's time to get out.

With the assassination last week of Malcolm Kerr, president of the American University of Beirut, living conditions for Americans in Lebanon have become tense. Considering terrorist actions there, soon it may no longer be safe to be an American in Beirut.

The Islamic Holy War organization claimed responsibility for the assassination. A spokesman for the organization said Kerr was a "victim of the American military presence in Lebanon," and the group vowed that no Americans would remain in Lebanon. Other American diplomats and professors are now cautious, being careful not to take any chances that could threaten their safety. Many are considering leaving Lebanon.

The Reagan administration has focused foreign relations on the Mideast by stationing Marines as peacekeepers in the region. But considering the continual violence and upheaval, including the tragic attack directed at the Marines in October, are our armed forces really "keeping the peace?" Or does their presence only contribute to the strife? The assassination of Kerr seems to indicate the latter.

Highway rest areas cause stink

Be it ever so humble, there's no place like... a highway rest area. Several Kansas legislators think so, anyway.

The Kansas Department of Transportation has stayed an order to close rest areas beside the state's highways until it can do more study. The department made its decision after several legislators grilled John B. Kemp, KDOT secretary.

Kemp agreed on Jan. 16 to stay until the end of April the KDOT's plan to close 26 roadside rest areas, transfer control of 57 areas to civic organizations and reduce the level of service at 20 areas. Under the plan, announced last fall, 79 rest areas would be kept and upgraded by the state.

Most of the rest areas to be closed under the plan are located in rural areas.

Kemp said the state could use the money saved by implementing the plan to repair Kansas' primary highway system.

"I guess I just felt we needed our resources so badly on our primary highway system that that is where our money should go," he said.

Legislators reported their constituents didn't take the KDOT plan, er, sitting down.

Rep. Richard Harper, R-Fort Scott, said the closing of a rest area west of Fort Scott generated more complaints from his constituents than any other issue in his 20 years in the Legislature.

The KDOT had dug out the entrance to the rest area and torn up the asphalt, Harper said, which "made it so nobody could take it over."

Or, might I add, use it.

Rep. Larry Erne, D-Coffeyville, said the closings have affected him. He said he has nowhere to stop during the first 125 miles of his trip from Coffeyville to Topeka.

I can understand Erne's concern. When I travel from Chanute to Manhattan, I can stop 11 miles from Chanute, at Wilson County State Lake, or at Meivern State Park, halfway between Chanute and Manhattan, or at the Interstate 70 rest area midway between Topeka and Manhattan. If I take the "back roads," I am left without any rest areas.

Oh, sure, drivers can stop at the small towns and go to a service station. But service stations are becoming a thing of the past. Many "convenience stores" don't have public rest rooms, making them kind of inconvenient.

Rep. Ambrose Dempsey, D-Leavenworth, asked why the Department of Corrections wasn't asked about using inmates to maintain and repair the rest areas.

I think inmate labor might be a good idea. The inmates could look at this job as a "privy-lege."

The cost of transporting the inmates to the sites could outweigh the benefit of keeping the rest areas open. Another cost could include building additional correctional facilities to house the inmates closer to their duties. While Kansas could use the prison space, I'm not sure it can afford new facilities which are used primarily for housing a "latrine brigade."

Having civic organizations take over the maintenance of some rest areas is a good idea, but I wonder how long an organization would want to clean out the local roadside johns.

There isn't one easy, quick answer to this problem. Maintaining the rest areas isn't cheap, especially when it's time to replace old ones.

However, the state should keep as many rest areas open as possible. Kansas is trying to maintain its image as a friendly state. The issue of keeping rest areas open is directly tied into luring tourists, and their money, into the state. Nothing will leave a tourist so mad he won't return to Kansas as seeing the sign "Rest Area One Mile" and then discovering a "Rest Area Closed" sign at the area.

The slogan "Ah, Ah Kansas" then may develop an unwanted meaning.

Comparable worth isn't equality

Equal pay for jobs of comparable worth is a logical step from previous laws requiring equal pay for equal work. Or is it?

For Washington's state employees, comparable worth may soon be a reality. Although the decision is likely to be appealed, a U.S. District Court ruled the state will have to make salaries in jobs dominated by women equal to salaries in jobs of comparable worth.

Comparable worth will be determined by knowledge or skills, mental demands, accountability and working conditions. These factors will be converted into points: a maximum of 244 points each for knowledge and mental demands, 160 points for accountability and 30 points for working conditions.

Working conditions count for little under this system. Jobs requiring strenuous or unpleasant physical labor, but little training, will not be as valuable as jobs with good working conditions which require more skills.

Paying workers a higher wage to do difficult jobs is a way of insuring those jobs are done. Garbage collection, clearing streets of snow and other necessities may now become problems for the people of Washington.

Concrete skills such as typing or truck driving can be measured, but a value must be set on those skills. More coordination may be required to type well, but a bad typist will not kill someone on the road. Comparing skills requires subjective evaluation to determine which ones are more difficult and important.

Knowledge is another difficult quality to measure. Teachers have been trying to evaluate students' knowledge for years. Although most teachers have selected tests as a measurement device, there are many types of tests. If teachers cannot agree on the best way to measure knowledge, Washington state officials may have trouble deciding how to measure the knowledge necessary to do different jobs.

The years of education required to do a job can be used as a substitute for measuring knowledge. But for some jobs, a two-year computer science degree from Kansas Technical Institute is more useful than a four-year liberal arts degree from the University of Kansas. Should people in jobs requiring the four-year degree be paid more than those in jobs requiring the two-year degree? Decisions must be made on how to compare years of education and the subject of that education.

Evaluating a job's mental demands also requires subjective evaluation. A job which is demanding for one person may be easy for another. Expecting a Washington state official who has never held a particular job to make an accurate assessment of its mental demands is ridiculous.

Comparable worth is supposed to remove biases from wage determination, but all criteria for determining comparable worth are subjective. A point system using subjective criteria is sure to have some bias.

The comparable worth ruling applies only to jobs which employ more than 70 percent women. Jobs dominated by men or employing both sexes are ignored by the ruling.

Many women are in low-paying jobs. But are these jobs low paying because they are held by women or because the supply of workers exceeds the demand?

One problem is that 80 percent of women workers are in only 20 of 427 U.S. Labor Department job categories. The greater the supply of workers, the less those workers must be paid.

Some jobs dominated by men also are low paying. The majority of firefighters and police officers are men and, in many cities, are underpaid. These jobs require high levels of skill and accountability. The mental demands are great and the working conditions are not. Comparable worth legislation will not improve their salaries.

Teachers on secondary and university levels will not receive comparable worth salary increases because both men and women are employed. Elementary school teachers will be eligible for salary increases because women dominate that field.

Elementary schools are in little danger of having their teachers hired away by private industry. University teachers, especially in technological areas, can make far more money outside the university. Salary increases will be going to the part of the educational system where they will do the least good.

State budgets are not unlimited. If many state workers are eligible for comparable worth raises, the budget must be cut elsewhere. There are several places these cuts can be made.

Workers can be laid off. Women can be paid what they are worth at the expense of others' jobs.

Everyone can undergo pay cuts so the government can afford to equalize salaries. Union members often refuse to make wage concessions even to save jobs. It is unrealistic to expect unionized state employees to behave differently.

Taxes can go up. This is always a popular suggestion, especially if politicians are looking ahead to elections.

Using comparable worth to make salary determinations is not the best way to equalize men's and women's salaries. Instead, women should consider training for non-traditional jobs. Rather than trying to enforce comparable worth laws, the government should enforce existing anti-discrimination laws.

A study done by the state was the basis of the lawsuit which brought comparable worth to Washington. Gov. John Carlin recently ordered a similar study. Watch out Kansas — comparable worth may soon be here.

Single ticket sales could increase support

Editor,

Last fall my roommate and I decided to try for the student group reserved seating for basketball games, having experienced the first come, first serve way of handling tickets sales and seating during my previous years here (1974-77). Drawing a high ticket number, I was amazed at the fine seats we were able to secure, but was soon shocked and saddened by the paltry attendance.

But I immediately saw the "silver lining." I would be able to do something that formerly had been impossible: buy selected game tickets for my friends. What's more, they would be able to sit next to, or very near my seat, for I had noted at least half the seats in my section were unsold.

During semester break I took orders from friends and, after registering, proceeded to the ticket office. I found I could purchase tickets, but not for the seats I desired. These seats were being offered as season tickets at a reduced price ($29.25 for nine games). I asked how these seats would be handled if they weren't sold as season tickets, and was told that the only way to get that seat, for any game, was to buy the season ticket.

On Thursday, Jan. 19, my roommate phoned the ticket office prepared to pay $29.25 for the remaining schedule, to get the seat next to us. But these seats were no longer being offered in any way, at any price, nor would they be. It seems individual game tickets for these seats aren't printed, it's too late, or it's a hassle. Nonsense!

In light of the recent articles concerning the low attendance, it appears it will be hard to fill Ahearn if the seats aren't for sale.

Lutherans fund Beta Sig improvements

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

After a fire marshal's inspection last year, members of the Beta Sigma Psi fraternity were told they had until January 1984 to install a $4,000 centralized fire alarm system or the house would be closed.

Brian Smith, senior in bakery science management and then president of the fraternity, said the members had not thought of what they would do to raise the money when help came from the Aid Association for Lutherans.

"We were looking at all kinds of options," Smith said. "Somebody in the house mentioned the aid association, and it turned out they could do something for us."

"The Aid Association for Lutherans is a fraternal benefit insurance society," said Charles Carney, accountant in the animal science department and a member of the association. "It started about 80 years ago as a church life insurance fraternal benefit society where everybody would chip in a little money, and when someone died, they would pay the beneficiary.

"Unlike a lot of other organizations, they stuck to that principle. They limit their services to Lutheran people."

Smith said he first came in contact with the association when he went to see if they could help get a new roof for the house.

"There was a leak in our roof, and it needed to be replaced," Smith said. "Our house is one of the newest ones on campus, and we're still paying off the mortgage, so the (fraternity) alumni association couldn't afford to pay for the roof."

"Somebody suggested the association, and I contacted Mr. Carney. He said they couldn't help us with the roof because the money had to be used for concrete things, so they couldn't pay for the labor. But Mr. Carney was very interested in doing something for the house."

Beta Sigma Psi is an all-Lutheran fraternity, and many members attend St. Luke's Lutheran Church in Manhattan, Carney said. Members of the association heard about the situation at the house and decided they would try to help.

Once the project had been approved by the association's home office in Appleton, Wis., the Manhattan branch sent letters to over 130 branches in Kansas inviting them to join in the project, Carney said. A total of 28 branches participated.

Several fund-raising activities were sponsored for the project.

"Here in Manhattan we had a soup and pie supper, and we actually had it at the Beta Sig house," Carney said. "Other branches had different kinds of activities — some of them had bake sales, some had paper drives, and one group from Wichita served at a wedding reception and the money they got from that they put in (to the project)."

The association raised about $6,000 for the house, and the home office will match that, Carney said.

"We originally needed $4,000, but when we started looking into the situation, there were some other needs, so we set our goal higher," he said.

"He (Carney) really wanted to do something big," Smith said. "He was the one who really pushed us in to getting some other stuff, which was kind of nice."

Smith said the extra money would be used to buy some new furniture for the living room, a microwave oven and matching curtains in all the rooms.

"I was pretty surprised," Smith said. "It seemed kind of odd that a church society would fund improvements in a fraternity, even though we are Lutheran. The house is grateful to the Aid Association for Lutherans for all the effort they put into the fund-raising drive."

The fire alarm system, which includes smoke detectors, emergency lighting and fire horns, was installed in September when $4,000 had been raised, Smith said. A check for the rest of the money was presented to Paul Mellring, senior in modern languages and current president of the fraternity, Sunday during the 9 a.m. service at St. Luke's Lutheran Church.

"This was a real nice way for our members to get better acquainted with their members," Carney said.

Panel may discuss school-age bill

Students in Kansas may be required to attend school until age 18 if a bill introduced Jan. 10 in the Kansas Senate is passed.

Billy McCray, D-Wichita, and Frank Gaines, D-Augusta, introduced legislation which would raise the compulsory high school attendance age from 16 to 18.

The senate Education Committee has not set a hearing date for the bill.

"It remains to be seen whether the hearing will occur," said Dale Dennis, state Department of Education representative.

Concern about the increased dropout rate of Kansas students is the reason for the bill, McCray said. He estimated that 25 percent of Kansas students drop out of school.

The bill will be controversial because some people believe students should be able to choose whether or not to attend school, McCray said.

James Rezac, Manhattan High School principal, said he opposes the bill.

"High school is not for everyone. Other alternatives such as work and on-the-job training can be effective," he said.

Tom Hawk, director of secondary education for USD 383, said students who are forced to attend high school make it difficult for others to graduate. He said students who are forced to attend school would resent their loss of choice and create a bad learning environment.

"Passage of this bill would be a step backward in education. We need to provide a program that encourages the students' attendance," Hawk said, adding that only 7 to 10 percent of Manhattan High School students drop out.

"This relatively low dropout rate is due to the Continuation School, a social and academic program for students at risk," he said.

Passage of the bill also would mean an increase in the number of GED (Graduate Equivalency Diploma), because students would opt for a GED diploma instead. The bill requires students to stay in school till age 18 or until they receive their diploma or GED.

Residence hall occupancy drops

The transition from fall to spring semester usually brings a decrease in the number of students attending K-State. Although the decline becomes most obvious when the final enrollment figures are announced, it also can be noted in the occupancy level of the residence halls.

So far this semester the occupancy of the campus's 10 residence halls is 260 less than capacity, which is a decrease of .5 percent from last year.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, said he does not necessarily blame the enrollment decline for the decreased hall occupancy.

He said the students' residence hall preference varies from year to year, and the resident count at Boyd Hall and Putnam Hall is usually less than other halls because they have no air conditioning and the dorms' dining rooms close on weekends.

Air conditioning was unavailable when the halls were constructed during the 1950s, and the dining rooms of Boyd, Putnam and Van Zile are closed on weekends because 200-300 fewer students are served, Frith said.

The other residence halls suffer the traditional second semester decrease, but the effect is minimal. Currently, 91.5 percent of the residence hall rooms are occupied, compared to 92 percent during the fall semester.

Frith said Goodnow Hall and Edwards Hall are most popular. Edwards is usually one of the first halls to fill up, he said, because it houses only upperclass students and is smaller.

Senator may testify in car theft

DETROIT — U.S. Sen. Carl Levin says he will testify if necessary against a man he saw allegedly breaking into his mother's car, because "we didn't chase the guy halfway across town to do nothing."

The Detroit Democrat said Saturday he pursued the suspect eight miles in an aide's car before helping police make the arrest. He said he gave chase after seeing the car — a Ford belonging to his mother which he uses while in the city — pulling out of a parking space.

"What's unusual is that it was stolen right in front of the victim's eyes," Levin said in a telephone interview. "We were lucky. We got the guy and we got the car; that's what's important."

A 33-year-old Detroit man was being held in connection with the theft, police Lt. Thomas Peterson said. Police will seek a warrant from the Wayne County prosecutor's office, charging the suspect with unlawfully driving away a motor vehicle, Peterson said.

Banjo player caps dream at Opry

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — With nine busloads of friends from around his west Tennessee hometown cheering him on, 23-year-old banjo player Mike Snider performed on the Grand Ole Opry to cap a dream come true.

"He'll-o Gleason," Snider said as he walked on stage Saturday night, acknowledging the wild applause from 1,500 boosters — about 200 more people than live in his little town. A host of out-of-town relatives had also come along.

Snider, who works as a feed company salesman, was introduced by Roy Acuff, the 80-year-old "King of Country Music."

'Doonesbury' to return to papers

NEW YORK — While fans fiddled with other funnies as their beloved "Doonesbury" took a vacation from the comics pages, Gary Trudeau fathered twins and sent Zonker, B.D. and Uncle Duke to Broadway.

Now, between diapers and burps, the cartoonist is readying pen and ink for the return of his Pulitzer Prize-winning strip in September.

"At the present, we don't know what the story line will be," Lee Salem, editorial director of Universal Press Syndicate, said in a recent telephone interview. "But the play acts as a bridge between where the strip ended and where it will pick up."

When readers last saw "Doonesbury" a year ago, Joanie Caucus, the feminist lawyer, was having cosmic sensations with her infant son.

Newsman, station settle age suit

LANSING, Mich. — A television news anchorman's lawsuit claiming he was fired because of his age has been settled out of court.

Howard Lancour, 53, sued WLX-TV in Lansing and its owner, ARCO TV of Lansing Inc., claiming he was taken off the air and later dismissed from his $38,000-a-year job because the station wanted to replace him with a younger man. He claimed station officials told him he was attracting an audience that was too old.

Lancour and Adams TV said in a statement Thursday that the suit had been resolved "by an undisclosed agreement of the parties."

Lancour was taken off the air last spring and was fired as news director. He had worked at the station since 1960.

3-member cast creates unique show

Pantomime company delights crowd

By JOHN CREGO
Collegian Reviewer

McCain Auditorium was transformed Friday night into a mystical wonderland of animated delight for young and old. From a bean-bag chair that seemed to have a mind of its own to an ingenious worm with a head on both ends, an incredibly unique show kept the audience captivated and thoroughly entertained by the art of pantomime and acrobatics.

Review

The International Touring Company of Mummenschanz tickled the imagination of the children, and at the same time, made adults wonder,

"How'd they do that?"

The stage setting for Mummenschanz was simple, but effective for the type of format used by the company. The entire production was performed on and around one set, made of a small, raised platform located center stage and ramps sloping to the floor. The three-member cast of the company crawled, jumped, slithered and bounced up and down the ramps, creating their illusions.

During the first part of the show, the artists performed singularly, allowing time for the other two to change costumes.

The show's first program was obviously aimed at children's fantasies. The imaginative costumes worn by the company were designed to depict certain creatures of fact and fiction. For example, a giant "slinky" played catch with the audience by throwing a beach ball out and somehow catching it when thrown back from the crowd. The delightful comedy of this and all of the acts were refreshing and out of the ordinary.

The staccato of children's laughter was evident throughout McCain as one by one the acts — each three to five minutes long — were presented. Nineteen single acts made up the first part of the show.

During intermission a member of Mummenschanz entertained in the lobby, allowing the audience to enjoy more intimate and personal contact with the entertainer. Meanwhile, another member mingled with those in the auditorium, letting audience members make a face on her blank mask with masking tape.

More uproarious laughter greeted the second part of the show. It differed from the first in that the mime was done with no costumes, only masks. It consisted of 20 mini-acts with two, and sometimes all three, of the performers on stage at the same time. The masks were abstract and not related to anything. Some were made of such things as small blocks and rolls of toilet tissue.

The climax of the show came when two members of the company had a duel by creating different forms of masks with a type of putty attached to their masks.

The simple humor in the second program was consistent with the first, but lost some appeal. The costumes in the first half added more to the audience's imagination.

The members of Mummenschanz — Lydia Biondi, Peter Gerber and Alejandro Moran — expertly demonstrated that elaborate costumes, sets and eloquent words are not needed to create an atmosphere of illusion to entertain.

Games offer challenge for local wizards

Students wishing to participate in Dungeons and Dragons and other fantasy role-playing games can now meet Saturdays in Seaton 161 because of an "open-gaming" room sponsored by the StarRiders club.

StarRiders, the K-State and Manhattan Science Fiction group, held its first open-game room last Saturday.

Ron Walker, junior in computer science, said the game room is a service to teach people about the different science fiction and fantasy role-playing games, in particular Dungeons and Dragons, but he said any game is open for those wishing to play something else.

Miniature games, those which require the use of model terrain and miniature figures instead of cardboard pieces, also are encouraged.

"We're running this (miniature games) two or three times to see what the interest is," Walker said.

Other games popular with the group are Gamma World, Space Opera and Travellers, which are made by TSR, a manufacturer of several science fiction games. Samuel Mize, a StarRiders member, stressed the values that games can serve.

Local skiers prefer small hills to spills

By ANDY OSTMEYER, Features Editor and DALLAS HASENBANK, Collegian Reporter

Tired of jogging in the winter because it's so cold? Tired of downhill skiing because of the spills? Or just tired of downhill because of the expenses?

Cross-country skiing is slowly gaining popularity in Kansas because it offers an alternative to all of these problems. And when a gust of snow decides to blow, many K-State students and Manhattan citizens hit the trails.

This year Kansas has had an exceptional winter for cross-country skiing. It's a lot of fun but is a vigorous sport, and I'm enjoying it," Don Graber, senior in computer science, said.

The popularity of cross-country skiing has been increasing over the last 10 years, but varies depending on the amount of snow the state receives.

One of the reasons for the sport's increasing popularity is that people are looking for an attractive alternative to jogging during the winter. Susan Koelliker, manager of a local skiing supply store, said.

"It doesn't require a lot of skill or physical fitness," Koelliker said, "and it isn't particularly dangerous — not like downhill."

"It is a good form of exercise," said Dave Colburn, another employee of the store.

Greg Scircle, instructor for University for Man cross-country skiing class, said the popularity of cross-country skiing is increasing across the nation.

Nationally, it is growing faster than downhill skiing," he said.

The increased popularity is partly due to the fact that extras such as lift tickets aren't necessary, and once the initial price for skis is paid, there are no other expenses.

Although several cross-country skiers said Kansas has nice skiing terrain, they agreed there are also problems.

Scircle said skiing would be better if the grass were cut, so the skis wouldn't snag, and if the ground wasn't so rocky.

"It's (Kansas) nice and rolling — really good terrain," he said.

The ideal setting for cross-country skiing is four or more inches of snow, a rumbling terrain and lots of land to travel on, said Koelliker, who also cross-country skis in Kansas.

Koelliker said she likes to go skiing because it provides a feeling of being alone.

"It is a quiet, peaceful sort of sport," she said.

Koelliker and Colburn said some of the best places to go cross-country skiing are Warner Park, Cicco Park and areas near Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

More adults brace themselves for benefits of dental care

By ANDY OSTMEYER
Features Editor

"The tin grin is in," and it's not just for young people anymore. More and more adults are wearing braces than ever before.

The increase in adult patients desiring braces has doubled in the last 10 years and now accounts for approximately 20 percent of all orthodontic patients, said Rhonda Richards, communications coordinator for the American Association of Orthodontists.

Richards said there are several reasons for the increase in the number of adult patients. There are new innovations in braces which make them less noticeable. They are smaller and can be made out of clear plastic or other less noticeable materials. The development of lingual bonded braces, also known as invisible braces, have made braces more acceptable because they are bonded to the back of the patient's teeth instead of the front, making them less conspicuous.

Richards cited an increase in orthodontic insurance coverage, the fact that braces are more acceptable now and more knowledge about the benefits of dental treatment as other reasons for the growing number of people wearing braces.

Straight, well-aligned teeth are easier to clean and easier to maintain, there is less risk of gum disease, and speaking and chewing are much easier, Richards said.

"Adults are becoming more aware of what orthodontists can offer them," Dr. Charles Morton, Manhattan Orthodontist, said.

Morton said that approximately 10 percent of his patients are adults, which he said is double the number he had a few years ago.

There are a number of reasons for the increase, Morton said, including greater understanding of dental hygiene on the part of the general population, as well as a growth in the amount of dental technology.

According to Morton, more of society's role models, such as actors, actresses and athletes, are wearing braces, which is making it more acceptable for the population in general.

"Quite a number of celebrities have braces," he said. "It has become the thing to do rather than the thing to avoid."

Morton said there is a problem with adult dental treatment in that the jaw and mouth are already formed, whereas in a child, the development is still taking place.

"We can still offer a fair amount of service," Morton said.

Of his adult patients, Morton said approximately 25 percent of them require surgery.

Morton said his adult patients range in age from 21 to 57 years.

Don MacArthur, a 57 year-old farmer in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, has had braces for three of the 18 months which his dentist said he would need to wear them.

"I could put up with it for a year and a half if it does what it's supposed to do," MacArthur said.

His overbite has caused his top teeth to wear away teeth on the bottom row. He said he went to two dentists, and they both said it would be impossible for him to wear dentures. So he opted for the braces.

He said his parents took him to a dentist in the late 1930s when they realized he had a problem. But braces cost $200 and "that was a lot of money then," he said.

MacArthur said he is self-conscious about wearing braces. "There are very few men that wear them when they get to be my age."

Cheryl Gardner, junior in secondary education, said she got her braces last June and expects to wear them for about eight months.

The reason she waited until now to get her braces was because she wasn't able to afford them earlier, whereas she can afford it now.

"I really learned that there are a lot of people who have had braces," Gardner said, adding that as one reason why most people understand the way she feels.

"I don't think twice about them now to really smile," she said. "I'm really looking forward to having them off."

Vicki Meinhardt, senior in radio&television and political science, agreed that most people are supportive and understanding of adults who wear braces.

Meinhardt, who received her braces two years ago, said her family could not afford them before she was 22 years old.

"There is a sort of team spirit among adults who have braces," she said. "I'm really proud of my braces."

K-State's upset bid over Sooners falls short

University of Oklahoma's All-American center Wayman Tisdale pulls down a rebound over K-State's Eddie Elder during first half action at Ahearn Field House Saturday afternoon. Both players scored 30 points in the contest before fouling out late in the game. Elder got the edge in rebounds for K-State, grabbing 12 to Tisdale's five.

Despite the fact that the University of Oklahoma Sooners' All-American center Wayman Tisdale finally met his match in K-State's Eddie Elder, it was Tisdale's team that prevailed, 83-80, in a hard-fought, regionally televised basketball contest in Ahearn Field House Saturday afternoon.

The Sooners used a clutch basket by guard Shawn Clark and a free throw by forward David Johnson with 14 seconds left to hand the Wildcats their second straight Big Eight Conference defeat in as many tries. The 6-foot-9 Tisdale, who is second in the nation in scoring with an average of 29.8 points per game, scored 30 points to lead the Sooners, but the 'Cats' 6-foot-9 center Elder matched Tisdale's 30 points and out-rebounded his counterpart 12 to five.

Elder did most of the defensive work on Tisdale. The 'Cats used a sinking zone defense, collapsing around Tisdale when he got the ball, but Elder still found the going rough.

"He (Tisdale) has a heck of a move down there," Elder said. "He's real tough once he gets the ball. He uses his body to find where you are. He's a strong player."

Tisdale met a player on a hot streak. Coming off a good performance Wednesday night in a 60-58 loss to Oklahoma State University, Elder's performance Saturday was the best of his career at K-State.

"I haven't played any better than I have last two games, since I've been at K-State," Elder said. "I've prepared myself a little better, and I'm going out and playing basketball rather than worrying about little things."

"I'm freeing up and trying to be more physical."

Elder wasn't the only player trying to be physical Saturday. A total of 43 fouls were whistled against the two teams with three players — K-State's Elder and sophomore forward Ben Mitchell and OU's Tisdale — fouling out.

K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman said that while Oklahoma was a physical team, it was his squad that put the Sooners on the free-throw line too many times. The Sooners hit 21 of 30 attempts at the line while the 'Cats got 20 charity tries, making 16 of them.

Hartman said he thought the referees watched K-State's defense against Tisdale too closely.

"Wayman Tisdale is a great player, but you can't breathe on him," he said, adding that he thought Tisdale pushed off on his move to the basket more than he should have been allowed to.

OU Head Coach Billy Tubbs saw the situation differently.

"I thought Wayman played tough," he said. "It's tough to score with 600 pounds of flesh hanging on you the whole game."

While K-State is known for its conservative style, the 'Cats tried to run with the fast-paced Sooners.

"I thought we were a little impatient, but when you break the press you've got to try to score," Hartman said. "Our halfcourt game was a little impatient, but that's a result, possibly, of our youth."

'I'm very proud of my team. They fought hard and gave a tremendous effort.'

— Jack Hartman

The Sooners' full-court pressure defense gave K-State fits throughout the game, as they forced the 'Cats into 18 turnovers while the Sooners turned the ball over only six times.

"We were getting the ball too far down, too low, and we made some bad decisions on our passes," guard Jim Roder said. "I know I made some bad passes off the press, and it really hurt us."

After OU forged an early lead, the 'Cats fought back with a little help from the Sooners' Tubbs.

With Elder at the charity line, Tubbs badgered the officials about the foul call until he drew a technical from referee Ed Schauer.

"That was mild," Tubbs said. "The veins on my neck didn't even stick out."

Elder hit four straight shots from the line and hit a jumper on the possession to give the 'Cats the lead, 12-10. For the game, Elder hit 12 charity tosses without a miss.

Later in the half, with the Sooners up 22-18, Hartman received his technical. Guard Jan Pannell hit the charities to push the Sooner lead to six.

"It wasn't anything I said or did but its get-tough time because of what's been going on," Hartman said in reference to Tubbs' habit of intimidating the referees in order to influence their calls.

With 6:23 remaining in the half, Jonas Cody made a layup off a steal to put the 'Cats up 34-33. At the end of the half, forward Lafayette Watkins, making his first start of the year, nailed a jumper from 18 feet away with seven seconds left, giving the 'Cats a 46-45 halftime advantage.

In the second half, Tisdale took over, scoring inside and at the freethrow line. The Sooners opened up an eight-point bulge in the first five minutes of the half, but K-State again closed the gap. A long jumper by junior forward Tom Alfaro pulled the 'Cats within two, 68-66, with 10 minutes left.

At the 1:17 mark, Tisdale drew his fifth foul on a drive by Alex Williams, whose three-point play knotted the score at 78-all. Tisdale's departure brought relief to those K-State fans who remember his two last-second, game-winning baskets a year ago, but OU found two new heroes in Clark and Johnson.

After Tisdale's departure, the Sooners worked 40 seconds off the clock until Clark made a layup, giving OU a four-point cushion, 82-78, with 27 seconds remaining.

After an Elder jumper brought the 'Cats to within two, Elder intentionally fouled Johnson, a 56 percent free-throw shooter. Johnson made one of two charity tosses, and a Sooner rebound of a missed shot by Roder preserved the victory.

Hartman had nothing but praise for his team.

"I'm very proud of my team. They fought hard and gave a tremendous effort," he said. "We did a great job on the boards, and we shot the ball well, but we made some mistakes on the press."

"It's kind of tough. We're a little down right now," Roder said. "We're going to have to pick ourselves up. We play a game every Wednesday and Saturday, so we have to keep going to the next one."

The 'Cats will attempt to win their first conference game when they travel to Boulder to play the University of Colorado Buffaloes. Iowa State University will be K-State's next home contest foe on Feb. 1.

Ticket sales remain low despite sale

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

In a recent drive to raise student ticket sales for Wildcat men's basketball games, the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics again has found little student response.

At the beginning of this semester, the athletic department offered a nine-game package, featuring seven Big Eight contests, for $29.25. The response wasn't overwhelming — less than 100 tickets were purchased by students.

Ticket Manager Carol Adolph, who suggested the sale idea, said the second semester ticket offer wasn't a first-time event.

"In the past, we sold tickets second semester for the benefit of the new people coming in," she said. "We did it this year because the student ticket sales have been down so much, but there wasn't much interest shown."

Adolph said the last time second semester tickets were sold was during the 1970-71 season.

Student ticket sales have dropped considerably during the past year. Last year the athletic department sold 5,800 student season tickets, while this year only 2,800 student tickets have been purchased, Adolph said.

Dick Towers, K-State athletic director, said there are several reasons for the poor ticket sales this season.

"Our students are responding to the ticket price and to the economy," he said. "More people are watching their money, and I think that has affected the sales. Our team not having a winning record last year may have also affected the sales."

Towers said he isn't very concerned with this year's sales loss.

"I can't say I'm disappointed with the fan support this year. I've been happy with those fans who do come out to the games — our crowd enthusiasm has been the same," he said. "I've been disappointed with the student sales. I thought we would sell more tickets. But I'm not going to be too concerned right now."

Lady 'Cats romp to 88-70 victory

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

A fast-break attack that placed six players in double figures led the Lady 'Cat basketball squad to a 88-70 Big Eight Conference victory over the University of Oklahoma Sooners Saturday night at Ahearn Field House.

K-State improved its overall record to 11-3 and its Big Eight record to 2-0, while Oklahoma falls to 12-3 overall and to 0-2 in the conference. The Sooners lost their first conference game of the season to the University of Colorado Jan. 18.

OU took the game's opening lead off an inside bucket by center Mandy Miller and led four times in the contest. K-State took the lead for permanently after a 10-foot jumper by sophomore Jennifer Jones.

The Lady 'Cats outscored the Sooners 10-0 in a three-minute period to take a 21-10 advantage, and later increased that lead to as many as 14 points. OU's Lynn McCurdy hit a 18-foot shot from the right wing to close the gap, 23-17, but the Sooners could get no closer in the contest.

Freshman reserve Sue Leiding closed out K-State's first-half scoring, hitting two straight inside shots to increase the 'Cats' lead to 40-28. Leiding finished the contest with 14 points, bettering her previous career-high of 12 against Oklahoma State University Jan. 18.

K-State opened the second half with strong inside play, utilizing short shots from underneath to take a 19-point lead during the first four minutes of play. Jennifer Jones connected for six points during the 'Cats scoring surge.

Behind the play of Jacquetta Hurley and Cynthia Pickens, OU fought back to trail by only ten, 58-48, with ten minutes remaining in the contest. Hurley and Pickens accounted for 10 of the Sooners' 14 points as OU outscored the 'Cats 14-5.

K-State did some fast scoring of its own, however, hitting five straight buckets to take a 73-48 lead. Five points from Leiding and a short inside shot and driving layup from freshman starter Carlisa Thomas highlighted K-State's play.

The Sooners could get no closer than 16 points to the Lady 'Cats, fouling out four of their five starters within the contest's last six minutes.

Thomas closed out the scoring, hitting two free throws with 13 seconds remaining to give K-State its final 18-point margin of victory.

Jennifer Jones led the six-player double figure scoring attack for the Lady 'Cats, hitting seven of 13 field goals and two of two free throws for 16 points. Six-foot-1 center Angie Bonner finished with 15 points, followed closely by Leiding with 14. Thomas and Cassandra Jones with 12 each and sophomore Sheronda Jenkins with 11. Jenkins also dished out 12 assists.

"A goal for her (Jenkins) was to see how many assists she could get," Hickey said. "She really played the game we wanted her to tonight."

OU's Hurley led all scorers in the contest, utilizing a 10-of-17 field goal performance and a two-of-four showing from the line for 22 points. Pickens finished with 12 and Lynn McCurdy added 11 to the Oklahoma effort. McCurdy was the Sooners' leading scorer and rebounder prior to the contest with Colorado, averaging 17 points and 7.3 rebounds per game.

Thomas and the 5-foot-7 Cassandra Jones led the Lady 'Cats in rebounding, each pulling down nine rebounds. K-State won the team rebounding title, grabbing 41 boards, compared with 32 for OU.

Despite 24 turnovers, Head Coach Lynn Hickey said she was pleased with the 'Cats execution of the fast break.

"We had some really nice fast breaks tonight," Hickey said. "Although we had an increase in turnovers, I thought we had some good ball movement."

"Right now we're doing real good on the fast break, but we're not doing well on the execution of our offense. That's something we need to improve."

K-State finished the contest hitting 32 of 58 field goals for 55 percent, but connected on only 24 of 38 free throws for 63 percent. Free throw shooting continues to be an area where the 'Cats need improvement, Hickey said.

"The thing I'm not proud of is our free throw shooting," she said.

"We've been working real hard in practice and we made more of an effort tonight, but it is still a problem. On the other hand, our field goal shooting has been consistent all year and was so again tonight."

The Sooners, who had an 11-game winning streak before their loss to the University of Colorado, came into Saturday's encounter outscoring their opponents by an average of almost 30 points.

"Oklahoma has a good team," Hickey said.

Raiders, Allen run hog wild over Redskins, 38-9 Tickets

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Everything John Riggins and the Washington Redskins were supposed to do, Marcus Allen and the Los Angeles Raiders did — and better.

Riggins promised he'd run roughshod over the LA defense, just as he thundered through Miami's for a Super Bowl-record 166 yards on 38 carries a year ago. Instead, while Riggins was limited to 64 yards on 26 carries, Allen blazed his way through the Redskins for 191 yards on just 20 rushes, one covering 5 and another a record 74 yards for touchdowns against the National Football League's finest rushing defense.

Those weren't all the ingredients that went into a 38-9 triumph for the Raiders Sunday in Super Bowl XVIII.

The nearly mistake-proof Redskins, defending Super Bowl champions, were supposed to keep their cool, keep control. Instead it was the mistake-prone Redskins who lost the ball four times, with two of those turnovers leading to electrifying touchdowns.

Derrick Jensen, a reserve tight end and LA's special teams captain, recovered a punt he had blocked and scored, and then Jack Squirek, a backup linebacker, dashed 5 yards for a touchdown with an interception of an ill-conceived Joe Theismann screen pass with seconds to go before intermission.

Between those scores, Jim Plunkett passed 12 yards to Cliff Branch for a second-period score. Allen applied the coup de grace in the third quarter with two touchdowns — running 5 and a Super Bowl record 74 yards to put the Raiders safely in command for their third — and most lopsided — Super Bowl triumph. The 38 points by the Raiders were also the most points scored in a Super Bowl contest.

"We lost in every way," Washington Coach Joe Gibbs said after his Redskins failed to repeat as the National Football League champions. "It wasn't Redskins football. I think overall credit has to go to L.A. They did such a great job. They rushed the ball on us. We never really got into the groove. They did a good job pressuring us."

The Redskins had been 3-point favorites to win their second successive Super Bowl — but by holding Riggins to 64 yards and Washington's only touchdown, a 1-yard dive in the third period, the Raiders became the only team besides the Pittsburgh Steelers to win more than two Super Bowls. The Steelers won four times in the 1970s.

Three plays served to propel the Raiders to this victory over a team whose record of 14-2 was the best in the National Football League during the regular season — Squirek's interception, Allen's broken-play run and, between them, a defensive stand that stopped Riggins on fourth-and-one at the LA 26 late in the third quarter. As if that wasn't enough, the defense also blocked a Washington extra-point attempt and forced a Theismann fumble that ended a Redskins threat in the fourth period.

The Redskins never were really in the game.

With the Raiders holding a 14-3 lead, Ray Guy's 27-yard punt buried the Redskins at their own 12-yard line with 12 seconds remaining in the first half. Theismann brought his team to the line with three receivers lined wide to the right, apparently ready to try for a bomb.

Instead, he only looked to his right, then turned to his left and found Joe Washington was a step outside defensive end Lyle Alzado. Theismann lofted the ball toward his all-purpose runningback as Squirek, sweeping to his right, stepped between them, grabbed the ball and was in the end zone in a flash.

The Raiders' bench erupted, Coach Tom Flores grinning widely while his players danced around. On the other sideline, Coach Joe Gibbs muttered what for him what must have been an expletive at what had become a 21-3 halftime deficit.

Riggins and Allen traded touchdowns in the third period before the Redskins, now down 28-9, began a drive in hopes of closing the gap. Less than a minute remained when the momentum turned against the Redskins.

A year ago, on a fourth-and-one against Miami, Riggins broke loose on a sweep to the left for 43 yards and the winning touchdown. On Sunday, with Washington facing fourth-and-one at the LA 26, the Raiders were waiting for him when linebacker Rod Martin pursued the sweep to the left and stacked up Riggins for no gain.

"I felt there was some daylight to the outside, but when I got there, I just couldn't see it," Riggins said. "I didn't have 20-20 vision today. I made some bad reads and I was guessing on their defense. Unfortunately, I was guessing wrong almost all day."

On the very next play, with 12 seconds remaining in the period, the Raiders ended any chance the Redskins had.

On first down, Plunkett handed off to Allen, who began sweeping to his left, only to find strong safety Ken Coffey in his way. Allen reversed, cutting back to the right, then suddenly cut upfield through a mammoth hole in the middle of the line and was gone for his 74-yard scoring run, 16 yards longer than the record Baltimore's Tom Matte had held since Super Bowl III.

"It was a foulup," the 6-foot-2, 220-pound athlete out of the University of Southern California said. "I was supposed to stay inside my blocker but I went outside. There was nothing there, so I reversed my field. Then I found the seam and I was off to the races."

"It was my fault, but it turned out fine."

It was now 35-9 and the Raiders only needed Chris Bah's 21-yard field goal with 2:24 remaining to shatter the record of 35 points scored by Green Bay in the first of these 18 Super Bowls and the Steelers in Super Bowl XIV.

Theismann, the Most Valuable Player during the season, spent much of this game running for his life as the offensive line — the famed Hogs — was unable to contain the Raider rush and the LA secondary took away his bevy of receivers. He was sacked six times, intercepted twice and completed only 16 of 35 passes for 243 yards.

"Everything turned sour right from the beginning," said Washington place-kicker Mark Moseley, who missed a field goal and had an extra-point blocked, continuing his slump that began in the National Football Conference championship game against the San Francisco 49ers when he missed four field goal attempts.

"It started when they blocked Jeff's punt, and we just seemd to go downhill from there."

Moseley was referring to Hayes' punt that was blocked by Jensen and recovered in the end zone for a Los Angeles touchdown early in the first quarter.

The Redskins saw their streak of 24 straight games of scoring at least 21 points ended by an aggressive Raider defense.

"We played hard, but the Raiders were all over us," said Redskin wide receiver Art Monk, who had just one catch.

The Redskins, who reached the Super Bowl while compiling a 16-2 record and led the National Football League in the plus-minus turnover ratio, fell victim to their own mistakes Sunday.

"Let's give all the credit to the Raiders. They played a great, great game," said Redskin guard Russ Grimm.

The Redskins, trailing 21-3 at halftime, opened the second half with an impressive touchdown drive to pull within 21-9.

"If we could have held them on that next drive, we could have made a drive of it," said safety Mark Murphy. "But they came back, thanks to that bum call, and we never recovered."

Murphy referred to a pass interference call against cornerback Darrell Green that netted the Raiders 38 yards. Los Angeles then moved in for a touchdown that increased the margin to 28-9.

"I can't agree with the call, but I'm not going to argue, that's the way those things go," Green said.

Allen said the MVP award he won did not have the same thrill as the Heisman Trophy, which he won two years ago.

"The Heisman is strictly an individual honor," he said. "Beating the Redskins as we did was strictly a team effort."

Someone suggested that the MVP was an individual award in itself.

"I can't accept it that way," he said. "There were too many great defensive plays which were equally as important, if not more important, than what I did. I was just lucky to have a couple of big plays."

Towers said a good 'Cat showing starting the Big Eight season might help boost ticket sales.

"The potential of our club right now is we may challenge for the title or finish in the second division. It just depends on how our younger players respond."

No further promotions are planned to boost ticket sales, Towers said, but the remaining student tickets will go on sale to the general public.

The money lost from ticket sales won't have a great affect on the athletic budget, Towers said.

"We'll finish with not as big of a reserve as we thought (due to poor ticket sales)," he said. "But we can't afford to do this very long, as we form budgets on our anticipated revenue."

To avoid a similar loss of sales next season, Towers said he plans to meet with various student organizations to see if adjustments in ticket prices or other changes, such as different ticket office hours, need to be made.

Renovation to begin this summer

Architecture students design zoo tier

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Two K-State students are designing plans for the renovation of the top tier of Sunset Zoo which will provide animals with a more natural living environment.

The facility occupies a hill which is divided by landscaping into several tiers.

Chris Dring and John Poston, seniors in landscape architecture, are designing the renovation to gain practical professional experience while attending K-State.

"This is the kind of experience you get the first two years you're out of school," Dring said.

The exhibits on the top tier, which were originally built for birds in the late 1950s, contain concrete floors, dead wood and scattered rock areas.

"They (the exhibits) aren't compatible with the animals. They are more like cages than exhibits, and an exhibit should show the people how an animal lives in a similar environment (to the animals' natural habitat)," Dring said.

The renovation includes five exhibits with three heated dens for proposed animals such as arctic foxes, climbing mammals and bobcats. Dring and Poston learned about the project from zoo docent Gary Arroyo, junior in pre-veterinary medicine.

Arroyo and Don Wixom, director of education at Sunset Zoo, discussed the possibility of asking students to do the work for the top tier. Arroyo recommended the two landscape architecture students, and Wixom agreed with the consent of Gerry Brady, Sunset Zoo director, and the city of Manhattan.

"Top tier is very important to the zoo because it's the first thing people see when they park their cars, and it's over by the concession stand and train station. It's an area that is seen by a lot of people," Brady said.

Renovation of the top tier is estimated to cost from $25,000 to $28,000 — more than double the total of the project's starting budget of $10,000 from the city of Manhattan.

In addition to the $10,000 from the city, the zoo has received gifts of $2,000 from Mr. and Mrs. Emmett Chartier of Manhattan and $2,000 from the late Dr. E.J. Frick, founder and veterinarian for the zoo for 50 years.

The additional money for the project is expected to be raised through a special drive by the Friends of Sunset Zoo.

Brady said certain aspects of the project will have to be left out if the total amount is not raised.

"We might have to cut down to just two heated dens instead of three and take out the nice brick walk that runs the length of the exhibits," Brady said. "Ideally, we would like to have what we have planned, but we may have to settle with something a little less."

Dring and Poston completed the design for the project by late spring 1983, and working drawings were completed during the summer with some assistance.

"There were two weeks last summer where all we did was eat and crank out construction drawings for the zoo project," Poston said.

The two students are working for nothing but experience and projects to add to their portfolios.

"In many ways it's better experience than an internship. We had to check prices on construction, which we never had to do in class," Poston said.

Brady said the project is mutually beneficial for both sides.

"I like students because they put in that little extra effort that professionals probably wouldn't have done, and it's good experience for them (Dring and Poston). Also, they can put it down on their resume and add to their portfolios, and we (the zoo) get top-quality work," Brady said.

The renovation for the top tier, if the funds are raised, will begin this summer. The total construction should last approximately one month.

"It means a lot to me to be able to leave something to the city after what it has given me while I've been here at school for six years," Poston said.

Construction students aid school

By TOM SCHULTES
Collegian Reporter

Because of assistance from the K-State student chapter of Associated General Contractors, children who attend Lee Elementary School, 701 Lee St., will have new playground equipment later this semester.

Rod Franz, immediate past president of the Lee Parent-Teacher Organization, initiated the project. During a 1981 trip to visit his in-laws in Hutchinson, his children's grandparents took the youngsters to a school playground where Franz saw the same style of equipment being built by the local students.

After returning to Manhattan, Franz set out to find the cost of such equipment and arrange fund-raising activities.

After the PTO approved the project, "fund-raising was in my hands," said school principal Hinnie Smith.

"We sold dozens and dozens of candles, which raised approximately $5,000," Smith said.

In addition, a chicken barbecue was conducted to raise money, and after Smith obtained a state grant, the $15,000 needed for the project was in school coffers.

The equipment originally was to be installed by a private contractor, but because of complications, that became impossible. It was then that Franz contacted AGC.

AGC president Rick Quint, senior in construction science, said the effort is one of the chapter's largest community service projects of the year. The group has been involved in the project since last summer.

"We also decided not to take this on as a freebie," Quint said. "The Lee school PTO decided to make a contribution of $500 to the chapter, which was basically used to cover costs and to buy equipment we didn't already have."

The equipment and materials needed for the project include 285 logs, 925 linear feet of steel pipe and 11 cubic yards of concrete for a pad and pathway leading to the structure, Quint said.

Although the equipment, from "Big Toys" of Tacoma, Wash., is in kit form, the students have no written plans for assembly, Quint said. The plans come in the form of a scale model of the finished product which must be measured and analyzed for construction, he said.

"All 93 of the vertical posts had to be staked out on the site before we could decide if it would work in a particular location," Quint said.

The construction of a concrete pad and path was not necessary for the equipment. But because many handicapped students attend the school, the concrete was included so pupils in wheelchairs can reach the equipment to pull themselves up from their chairs, Quint said.

"This equipment was designed for handicapped as well as regular students," Franz said. "If they have upper arm power and a little determination, they may still be able to climb."

Quint estimated that at least one-third of the structure is usable by handicapped students.

AGC playground equipment chairman Roger Feyerharm, senior in construction science, and project supervisors Larry Humes, senior in construction science, and Russ Ginn, junior in construction science, have coordinated the efforts of approximately 25 volunteer laborers.

So far, 277 man hours of labor have been expended, almost three-fourths of the number required to complete the equipment.

Local merchants — Becker Excavating & Grading, Cash Lumber and Hardware Inc. and Kershaw Ready-Mix Concrete & Sand Co. Inc. — have joined PTO members in donating equipment for the project.

Besides the wood and pipe climbing apparatus, the structure includes a tire climb, rope net, belt walk, suspension rings and a tire swing.

"Man, they're going to have a heyday with it," Quint said.

Each year, the 109 AGC chapters across the nation compete for awards based on competition in three basic categories: community, campus and social activities.

"In the past five years, the K-State chapter has received three first-place awards, one second place and one honorable mention," said Merrill Blackman, faculty adviser of AGC and associate professor of architecture and engineering. The first place award includes a $300 cash prize, he said.

Past local AGC projects have included painting and making bulletin boards for the corridors of the College of Engineering in Seaton Hall, Blackman said. The organization also has painted Justin Hall plaza.

The group's efforts can be seen in the "welcome to Manhattan" signs on Kansas Highway 177 south of the city and at the corner of Second and Humboldt streets, he said. A third sign, sponsored by the Manhattan Jaycees, is awaiting Kansas Department of Transportation approval and is to be placed at Warner Park Road and Kansas 18 west of Manhattan.

Experts dislike new rape penalties

Sentences for convicted rapists, including castration, have become more flexible under rape laws that went into effect last summer.

Since the laws went into effect July 1, 1983, a new development called chemical castration has been recently discussed on "60 Minutes" and in The Kansas City Star.

The chemical, Depo-Provera, is injected into the rapist and causes a reduction of sex drive.

"I have real concerns about it," Judy Davis, director of the Crisis Center, said, referring to chemical castration. "Rape is a crime of violence. The aggression will still be there, and castration, either actual or chemical, won't cure the problem."

Imprisonment is the most common punishment for sexual assault. Davis said she believes imprisonment is the most effective punishment.

Residivism, or repetition of a crime, is very high among rapists, Davis said. "We don't want these people loose on the street."

Caroline Peine, assistant dean of student development and director of both the women's programs and Women's Resource Center, said she believes punishments are the "great gray area" concerning rape.

"I don't feel imprisonment is effective rehabilitation," Peine said. However, "it does get them off the street, which is needed."

Rape laws and punishments vary from state to state.

One fairly universal change has been to drop the word "rape" and use criminal terms such as "sexual assault."

Texas drug smuggler fights government seizure of millions

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a drama resembling a script from television's "Dallas," Texas millionaire Rex Cauble is trying to prevent the government from seizing a fortune that prosecutors say he helped build by smuggling drugs.

Cauble, 70, a cigar-puffing horseman from Denton, was convicted in January 1982 of violating federal racketeering, banking and criminal travel laws in connection with a lucrative drug smuggling operation in Texas.

As part of his sentence, the government directed Cauble to forfeit his nearly one-third interest in Cauble Enterprises, a business empire that jurors determined was linked to the smuggling operation. Defense attorneys said virtually all of Cauble's personal estate was tied up in the business, which he managed and whose assets included ranches, steel and trailer companies and the ritzy Cutter Bill Western World clothing stores in Dallas and Houston.

The value of those assets has been estimated at between $50 million and $75 million, probably the largest sum ever at stake in the history of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, under which Cauble was convicted.

"I don't know how you could be financially more complex," said U.S. Attorney Bob Wortham in Beaumont, Texas, who has supervised the case for the government. He sees Cauble's estate as a big, juicy apple desired by many.

"We have to get a little knife and carve out our share," he said.

Convicted by a federal jury in Tyler, Texas, Cauble was sentenced to five years in prison, in addition to the forfeiture. He appealed to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, which rejected the appeal in May 1983.

Cauble has asked the Supreme Court to review both his case and sentence.

Pending resolution of his appeals, Cauble has continued to manage Cauble Enterprises through an arrangement with the government.

Under the deal, he draws a salary of up to $60,000 a year from the business.

Meanwhile, attorneys for the government and for Cauble's wife and son, the other two partners in Cauble Enterprises, have been trying to create a plan to satisfy the government should the Supreme Court reject Cauble's request.

"How to give the government interest without hurting these innocent people is fairly difficult," said Raymond A. Krell, a Houston attorney who represents Cauble's wife, Josephine, and his son, Lewis.

"The government realizes it is not in a position to directly manage and operate Cauble Enterprises," Krell said.

The two attorneys said Cauble's wife and son are trying to work out an arrangement whereby, if his conviction is upheld, they can buy out the government's interest in the partnership.

Recently, agreement was reached on the selection of an accounting firm to come up with a figure for the precise worth of Cauble's interest, they said.

"Nobody really knows," Krell said. "What we're trying to determine now is what the number is."

In scope and drama, the case from the beginning has been typically Texas.

The cast of characters has included Cauble, bushy-browed owner of a champion palomino named Cutter Bill; Charles "Muscles" Foster, a trusted Cauble ranch foreman accused of involvement in the smuggling but acquitted by reason of insanity; and a host of smugglers who came to be known as the "Cowboy Mafia."

The smuggling operation has been labeled the largest in Texas history by the government, which said that from 1976 to 1978 the smugglers brought more than 147,000 pounds of marijuana into the United States aboard several shrimp boats.

It said Cauble arranged sizable loans for Foster, that smugglers used Cauble Enterprises aircraft and that they stashed marijuana shipments at Cauble Enterprises ranches.

Meanwhile, as the smuggling continued, about $900,000 in unexplained cash found its way to a Cauble Enterprises bank account, the government said.

In seeking a Supreme Court review, Cauble's attorneys argued other things: that the trial judge had improperly instructed the jury, that the government did not prove all of Cauble Enterprises was involved in the smuggling and that it was unfair to take his entire interest in the business.

Cauble, they said in court papers, "lost everything, including assets acquired long before any alleged connection with wrongdoing..."

"Cauble has been deprived of his wealth simply because he has it, not because it was accumulated through crime," they said.

The government, urging the court to refuse a review, countered that the "unusually extensive forfeiture in this case is the result of (Cauble's) deliberate decision to use Cauble Enterprises to further the illegal scheme."

The forfeiture, the government argued, "is a suitable punishment for his crimes."

Fumes from chemical spill injure 70 Illinois residents

By The Associated Press

SAUGET, Ill. — An ice chunk may have fallen on the nozzle of a corrosive chemical storage tank Sunday, releasing a toxic liquid whose fumes injured more than 70 people, authorities said.

Sarah Gaines Collins, a spokeswoman for Monsanto Co., owner of the W. G. Krummrich plant, where the spill occurred, identified the corrosive chemical as about 6,000 gallons of phosphorus oxide.

She said seven Monsanto company employees were treated at the plant dispensary for minor irritation and returned to work. The spillage, which occurred about 12:30 p.m., was contained within about an hour, Collins said.

"One theory was that an icicle had formed and dropped onto the nozzle mechanism, setting the chemical free," Collins said. "I don't think they'll really know for sure until they have a chance to investigate tomorrow."

A spokesman at St. Mary's Hospital in neighboring East St. Louis said 53 people were treated for eye and lung irritation and released.

Smith was perhaps proudest of the changes which he brought in the area of criminal enforcement, particularly against drug traffickers. He brought the FBI for the first time into the fight against illegal drugs, making it a partner with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

During the transition before Reagan's inauguration, Smith led the Kitchen Cabinet's personnel task force that chose key members of the administration, many of them — like Smith — longtime members of Reagan's informal group of friends and advisers.

The meetings of that task force and of the Kitchen Cabinet generally were held in Smith's law offices at the Los Angeles firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, where Smith was the managing partner.

Smith's decision came as a surprise to associates who had heard him in the past express a desire to be the first attorney general since Herbert Brownell in the Eisenhower administration to complete four full years in office.

Reagan nominates Meese for position

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan on Monday nominated Counsellor Edwin Meese III, the hard-nosed point man for Reagan's conservative philosophy, to succeed William French Smith as attorney general.

Meese, 52, one of the "Big Three" White House aides, said he hadn't sought the post and "was really very happy with the job I had" as a policy-maker and Reagan's closest link with the political right.

See related story, page 8

But "I'm grateful to the president for giving me the opportunity and I will try to do as outstanding a job as Bill Smith did," said Meese, who was in Santa Barbara, Calif., to deliver a speech.

A White House aide, who asked for anonymity, said Meese "wanted this for a long time — from the first year."

Like Smith, Meese shares a law-and-order approach to the nation's judicial problems, favoring capitol punishment, relaxed rules for evidence in trials and less taxation for the wealthy. He has pronounced the progressive income tax "immoral," for example.

He also reaped scores of headlines when he questioned whether hunger was a genuine problem in America and suggested that many who go to soup lines do so only because they want something for nothing.

Meese was known, too, for his unwavering support for former Interior Secretary James Watt, and as architect of Reagan's bid to retool the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. He also backed an administration attempt to win tax exemptions for segregated private schools.

The consensus in Congress was that Meese would be confirmed by the GOP-controlled Senate, but hearings are likely to include a heated review of the administration's civil rights and antitrust policies.

Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee who will preside over the hearings, praised him as "an able man and dedicated person...He would make an excellent attorney general."

But House Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, D-Mass., said Meese's philosophy "is bad, to be perfectly truthful."

The nomination wasn't announced until Monday, but Reagan told Meese his decision Thursday, a day after Smith told Reagan he wanted to resign.

Nancy Clark Reynolds, a Washington lobbyist who once worked with Meese and remains close to him, said, "I think he's probably one

Traffic board approves parking fee increases

By DAVID BEVENS
Staff Writer

The Traffic and Parking Council approved an increase of $2 in parking permit fees for students and $5 for faculty and staff for the 1984-85 school year at a meeting last night.

The increase is the first phase of a two-part plan to increase fees by 25 percent by the 1986 fiscal year. Currently parking fees are $20 for students and $40 for faculty and staff.

"We (the council) took a lot of heat on the last one (increase). I don't think anyone wants that again," Art Stone, director of K-State Police, said. The last increase, which became effective for the 1982-83 school year, doubled the price of parking permits.

The council said students, faculty and staff favor the split increase over a larger increase. The increase will provide funds for future maintenance of parking lots.

The University provides 7,555 parking spaces for faculty, staff, students and others on 68.13 acres of main campus land. The 101 parking lots are worth about $4.5 million.

"It appears most of the people want to pay each year to make up the 25 percent increase that will be needed for 1986. We have money for 1984. We think we will have enough for 1985," Gene Cross, vice president of university facilities, said.

"Personally, I think we have good parking lots, and we should maintain and keep them up," said

Charles Long, associate professor of extension horticulture and chairman of the council. Long said the parking lots are an investment that should be maintained.

A report prepared by the Facilities Planning Department for campus police outlines the amount of money needed to improve the parking lots over a 10-year period. Total improvement and maintenance costs over the 10-year period are estimated at $2.5 million.

"This is an estimate of what is needed based on inflation, an estimate of the bidding climate, an estimate of student enrollment and what misuse fees will be," Cross said.

The increase is based on these estimates and doesn't include possible increases after 1986.

"We're not talking about after 1986. What we are saying is that in order to do this plan, we need to increase fees to accomplish it," he said. Currently almost $2 million are needed for lot improvement.

"Needless to say, we don't have that kind of money to come up with," Stone said. The council members justified the increase by pointing out that other campuses charge more for parking permits.

"I think if anyone researched other universities of comparable size, he would see that our fees aren't that high," Stone said.

Proposals for changes in regulations stated in the University traffic handbook will be discussed at the next council meeting at 3:30 p.m. Jan. 30 in Union 202.

Heated words mark hearing testimony

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

In what was often a heated discussion between witness and attorney, the appeal hearing for fired tenured faculty member Ben Mahaffey continued Monday.

Testimonial by Keith Lynch, assistant professor of forestry, became heated when Mahaffey's attorney, David Schauner, challenged the validity of student complaints Lynch was citing.

"I don't think their concerns needed validation. They were real to them," Lynch finally said in a raised voice to Schauner.

"I resented the fact that, for every action in the department, we had to think 'Is this going to influence the latest grievance' or 'Is this going to affect the civil lawsuit,'" he later said in testimony.

Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, has filed three faculty grievances since 1979 and a civil suit against several University administrators.

Shortly before the third grievance was filed in March 1981, Lynch said he was afraid for the safety of former forestry faculty member Tom Warner. Lynch said he had entered the department office one day to see Mahaffey and Warner in an argument in another room.

"I remained in the secretary's office in the result that it might end in blows," he said, adding Mahaffey had once told Warner he would "get him." Warner is now the head of the Department of Horticulture-Forestry at South Dakota State University.

Mahaffey was suspended from University duties and recommended for dismissal on Sept. 1, 1983. Because he is tenured, he has the right to appeal the action to a special Faculty Senate committee which will make a recommendation to President Duane Acker. Acker has been granted final decision in the case by the Board of Regents.

Lynch said he had built up a gradual dislike for Mahaffey, which probably began in 1981 when Mahaffey called him a "so-called Ph.D."

The two faculty members were in a departmental meeting when Lynch opposed a proposal by Mahaffey. Mahaffey became angry and said "I can't believe such a remark from a so-called Ph. D.," Lynch said.

Also testifying Monday was Randy Biswell, assistant state extension forester. Biswell said that in another departmental meeting on Oct. 27, 1980, it appeared Mahaffey used planned antagonism towards Harold Gallaher, former head of the forestry department.

"Dr. Mahaffey told Gallaher that he was not fit to be an administrator and it was time to step down," Biswell said, adding the statement's intent was to either cause Gallaher to have another heart attack — he was already in poor health — or cause him to strike Mahaffey.

"Mahaffey sure got loud," he said, when asked about the incident by Schauner. "I wasn't impressed that it was built up, but it was almost like it was planned."

Lynch said Mahaffey at another time had "accused us (the rest of the forestry faculty) at times of being chicken, knuckling under" and easily accepting administration recommendations.

During his years of teaching, Lynch said he has had several students come to him expressing concerns about Mahaffey. Some complained about sexist statements Mahaffey had made. Others complained about the associate professor's refusal to accept students' ideas that were either new to or opposed Mahaffey's ideas.

Lynch advised those students with complaints "not to oppose the man, do not cross him."

Schauner objected early in Lynch's testimony to citations of unattributed student complaints.

"These are the rankest kind and most unreliable kind of accusations," Schauner said. "They're the wildest kind of allegations and Dr. Mahaffey has no reason to cross-examine the witness."

Pete Cooper, professor of civil engineering and the committee's chairman, overruled the objection though, saying the complaints were pertinent information to the hearing.

The forestry department depends on students' word-of-mouth recruiting for more students, Lynch said, and in the past few years recruiting has declined because students haven't been happy with the department's internal problems. Overall low enrollment in agriculture programs also have hurt department enrollment, he said.

"My mind was never totally closed," he said, referring to the possibility of Mahaffey changing his Government declares Iran 'terrorist' nation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration officially designated Iran as a terrorist nation on Monday, declaring that the Tehran government had "repeatedly provided support for acts of international terrorism."

Iran joins Syria, Cuba, Libya and South Yemen on the list of terrorist countries that are subject to rigid export controls. Iraq was removed from the list earlier in the administration.

State Department spokesman John Hughes said the action wouldn't affect U.S. imports of Iranian oil. Oil imports resumed in 1982 and amounted to about 500 million barrels last year.

Officials had previously said Iran was partly responsible for the terrorist bomb that exploded at the U.S. Marine headquarters in Lebanon, killing 241 Americans.

Iran also is suspected of having been involved in other terrorist attacks against American facilities in Lebanon, including the U.S. Embassy in Beirut.

Adding Iran to the terrorist list is largely a symbolic action.

Hughes said it will lighten the restrictions against the export of military goods or other equipment.

Low salaries, fringe benefits jeopardize teaching quality

LAURI DIEHL
Assistant Government Editor

A report recently released by a Faculty Senate subcommittee indicates that low salaries and fringe benefits place K-State at a disadvantage when competing for the hiring and retention of faculty members.

An annual report by the Faculty Salaries and Fringe Benefits subcommittee of Faculty Senate compared salaries of K-State faculty members to salaries of other Kansans and those paid at peer institutions.

Verlyn Richards, professor of finance and subcommittee chairman, said faculty salaries affect the quality of education.

"We (the subcommittee) feel the quality of educational programs depends heavily upon the quality of faculty at the University," he said. "In order to attract and retain faculty, we have to offer competitive compensation."

The report showed K-State salaries usually rank sixth out of six when compared with those of peer institutions. The Kansas Board of Regents selected Colorado State University, Iowa State University, North Carolina State University, Oklahoma State University and Oregon State University as peer institutions based on academic and demographic similarities to K-State.

For fiscal year 1983, K-State moved to fifth place among the peer institutions.

Ronald Downey, associate professor of educational resources and subcommittee member, said North Carolina State paid the highest salaries of the peer institutions. Colorado State ranked second, followed by Oklahoma State, Iowa State, K-State and Oregon State.

According to the report, 1983 salary increases caused a decline — from 8.3 percent to 6 percent — in the amount K-State faculty salaries must increase to match average salaries for the peer institutions.

Gov. Carlin has proposed a 6-percent increase in faculty salaries for 1985. Richards said he does not know how the increase, if approved by the Kansas Legislature, will affect K-State's ranking.

"We don't know yet the extent to which K-State may improve its competitive position," he said. "We don't know at this point what the legislatures in other states will do."

The report also compared K-State faculty salaries to Kansas per-capita income. The constant dollar-per-capita income increased by 21.9 percent from 1970-1982. In the same period, faculty salaries declined by 13.3 percent.

The decline was due to differences between salary increases and the rate of inflation, Richards said.

"In past years, salary increases were about 6 or 7 percent," he said. "Inflation was running at 10 to 12 percent, so purchasing power was losing ground."

A 6 percent salary increase would begin to reverse the trend of declining purchasing power, Richards said.

"It's certainly encouraging this year to be talking about a possible 6 percent salary increase, when it appears inflation will be in the 4 to 5 percent range," he said.

Fringe-benefit deficits appear to be as serious a problem as salary deficits, Richards said. According to the report, fringe-benefit deficits exceed salary deficits when K-State is compared to peer institutions.

Faculty fringe benefits include state contributions to social security, medical insurance and the faculty retirement program for current and past employees. The report states these contributions equal 17.55 percent of the average K-State faculty salary.

The retirement program, Teachers Insurance Annuity Association/College Retirement Equity Fund, is one of the largest single components of the fringe-benefits package, Richards said. This is the most common pension program at universities across the country, he said.

K-State ranks below its peer institutions in the percentage of salary the state contributes to the retirement program.

"The state of Kansas contributes an amount equal to about 5 percent of faculty salaries," Richards said. "Faculty members contribute another 5 percent. There is a two-year waiting period before they can join the program."

The report shows the state contributes 17.86 percent of faculty salaries at Oregon State and faculty members do not contribute. At Oklahoma State, the faculty contributes 5 percent and the state, 10 percent. K-State ranks lowest of the six peer institutions.

K-State's two-year waiting period to join the retirement program is the longest of the peer institutions. The report shows Colorado State has a one-year waiting period for instructors and assistant professors only; full-time professors may join immediately. Oregon State has a six-month waiting period and the other peer institutions have none.

The report cites smaller percentage contributions combined with lower average salaries as reasons for deficits in the total value of K-State faculty fringe benefits.

K-State ranks lowest of the peer institutions when salary and fringe benefits are combined, Downey said. Oregon State is highest, followed by North Carolina State, Colorado State, Oklahoma State and Iowa State.

Despite having the lowest salaries, Oregon State offers the highest total compensation because of state contributions to the retirement program, Downey said.

"What they (Oregon State) have done to achieve the high level of compensation is to switch from individual to state contributions," he said. "The money doesn't show up as salary, but it shows up in total benefits."

Development of a long-term plan to improve salaries and fringe benefits is needed, Richards said.

"It will take some time to make salaries at K-State comparable against other institutions," he said. "So we are encouraging the development of a longer-range plan to provide a comparable level of both salaries and fringe benefits."

The subcommittee has not developed any improvement plans.

"I don't think it's our committee's role to develop the plan, because it's the legislature which ultimately must provide the funding," Richards said.

The Board of Regents would work on such a plan, he said.

"This is not just a K-State problem," he said. "The regents are always working on plans to improve the positions of its institutions. Then they make proposals to the legislature."

Council to discuss Union tobacco sales

The Union Program Council will discuss banning the sale of tobacco in the Union at the board's next meeting Jan. 31.

Mike Hatch, UPC program director, said the issue was brought up by Louis Herman, assistant professor of mathematics and Union Governing Board faculty adviser.

Herman said he had no comment concerning the tobacco question.

"I don't think the (tobacco sales) ban will go through," Hatch said. "Before a decision would be made, we would need to talk to the concessions department. It would be strange to pull tobacco out of the Union and leave it elsewhere (for sale on campus)."

Bill Wisdom, manager of Union Concessions, said there are 12 cigarette vending machines located on campus and owned by the Union. One machine is located in each residence hall and two are in the Union. In addition, cigarettes and chewing tobacco can be purchased at the Union Information Desk.

Cigarette machines represent about 5 percent of the total vending machine sales, Wisdom said. Cigarette sales earn approximately $800 per year in revenues for the Union.

"Prohibiting the sale of tobacco in the Union won't affect the Union a whole lot, although the two cigarette vending machines in the Union are the best selling machines (on campus)," he said.

Wisdom said UGB cannot prohibit the sale of tobacco from campus. Student Senate would make that decision. If the residence halls wished to have the vending machines removed, that decision would come from the residence hall system, he said.

If tobacco is banned from the Union, it would not mean smoking or chewing tobacco would also be disallowed. The restricted areas established for smokers in the Union would remain in effect, Hatch said.

Officials indict 53 in drug investigation

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Fifty-three people have been indicted in the "largest nationwide narcotics investigation ever," with 30 of them accused of smuggling five tons of cocaine worth $3.8 billion into the United States, authorities announced Monday.

The 53 were named in indictments unsealed Monday in Atlanta, Los Angeles, Miami and Little Rock, Ark. Some defendants were indicted in more than one city.

"We believe...it is the largest nationwide narcotics investigation ever," FBI agent Jim Nelson said in Los Angeles.

The 30 named in Atlanta were accused of operating what a Justice Department official called "the largest cocaine trafficking ring in the nation's history."

Associate U.S. Attorney General D. Lowell Jensen said the ring smuggled about five tons of cocaine from Colombia into Georgia, Florida, Tennessee and Pennsylvania in 1982 and 1983. Of that, authorities seized 2,700 pounds worth $940 million, he said.

"Measured by the amount of drugs, it is the largest cocaine trafficking ring ever broken up in the history of federal law enforcement," Attorney General William French Smith said.

The Atlanta indictment, returned Thursday, identified Harold J. Rosenthal, 53, of Atlanta, as the ringleader of the cocaine operation. He and five others were charged with violating the federal "drug kingpin" statute by engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise.

Rosenthal escaped from a federal prison in Memphis, Tenn., in 1981 and was at large until he was captured in Colombia and deported to the United States in September.

The indictment said he re-entered the United States several times during his two years as a fugitive and tried to arrange the slayings of U.S. and Colombian law enforcement agents after his arrest.

Nelson said in Los Angeles the probe was triggered in 1982 by information from a wiretap in an unrelated case.

Jensen said the probe was begun by the Drug Enforcement Administration and the FBI but was turned over to the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force.

U.S. Attorney George Proctor in Little Rock said the indictment there was the sixth — and last — in a series of Arkansas indictments flowing from the probe. He said in the earlier cases, 15 defendants are serving 74 years in prison and have been fined $128,000.

The Miami indictment accused Rosenthal and three others of conspiring to free Rosenthal from a federal prison in Miami where he was taken after his recapture in Colombia last fall.

The indictment issued Nov. 14 in Little Rock charged two of the defendants in the Atlanta case along with 11 others with conspiring to import heroin and marijuana.

The Los Angeles indictment charged 13 people — including Rosenthal and two other Atlanta defendants — with conspiring to import 60 tons of marijuana from Colombia on a tuna boat. No marijuana actually entered the country.

Congressional absences slow legislative action

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Amid election year jitters over the swelling federal deficit and military involvement in Lebanon and Central America, Congress on Monday convened a short 1984 session likely to be even shorter on legislative achievement.

"I don't look for a raft of legislation out there," said Democratic House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. as the House officially ended a seven-week recess.

In the Senate, the second session of the 98th Congress opened sluggishly. It took more than two hours to locate enough senators to call the chamber to order officially.

Majority Leader Howard Baker Jr. said in a presidential election year the congressional session is cramped by party conventions and campaigns for House and Senate. Baker himself is leaving the Senate to prepare for a possible campaign for president in 1988.

In the Democratic-controlled House, the session opened on a bitter partisan note as conservative Republicans unsuccessfully sought quick votes on legislation covering voluntary school prayer, abortion, a balanced budget amendment and Reagan's veto power on spending bills.

In both houses, the opening weeks of the session were likely to be dominated by concern over the presence of 1,600 Marines in Beirut.

O'Neill, for one, said wherever he went during the long congressional break, there were insistent calls by voters for a quick withdrawal.

He said he will schedule House action soon on bids to force Reagan to bring the Marines home earlier than the April 1985 deadline set by Congress in a War Powers Resolution approved last September.

O'Neill was a key figure in talks that led to the resolution. But after the truck-bombing that killed 241 servicemen in Beirut, he said he might change his mind about whether the troops should stay.

Of administration efforts to promote talks among the warring factions in Lebanon, O'Neill said he is pessimistic.

In the Senate, Democratic leader Robert Byrd Jr., D-W.Va., said unless Reagan can negotiate an end to the fighting in Lebanon soon, "I would anticipate some action will be taken" in Congress.

Reflecting a belief among Democratic critics that it would be as dangerous to order a quick withdrawal as it is to leave the Marines in Lebanon, Byrd said, "I wouldn't want them to come out tonight."

Byrd declined to predict how much time Reagan has before the House and Senate might force Reagan to withdraw the troops, but he called on the president to spell out a new plan for negotiations in his

State of the Union address Wednesday night.

Baker said "it would be a mistake" to approve a resolution requiring a pullout.

To ease the pressure on Lebanon among congressmen, Reagan sent Donald Rumsfeld, his special Middle East negotiator, to Capitol Hill to meet with key leaders on Tuesday.

Byrd and O'Neill agreed public sentiment for significantly reducing the federal deficit has eased. And without a major initiative from Reagan for more budget cuts and an increase in taxes, Byrd said, "I don't think there will be a lot done."

Job center schedules workshop

Students majoring in engineering and business have advantages in obtaining employment in today's job market, so the Career Planning and Placement Center is offering a non-credit seminar this semester to help those studying humanities and liberal arts.

"It is important for students to understand how a liberal arts education fits into the job world in which those who have a special niche appear better equipped to find jobs," Kathleen Lowman, assistant director of the center and seminar instructor, said.

"People with liberal arts degrees have been trained to do so many things — communicate, think critically, research, analyze, so they have the skills. Therefore, they must decide where their interests, skills and talents lie and focus on that," she said.

Lowman has scheduled the class for 3:30 to 4:20 p.m. each Wednesday from Feb. 8 through March 15 in Eisenhower 15. The seminar is designed especially for majors in many of the departments in the College of Arts and Sciences — anthropology, art, economics, English, geography, history, modern languages, philosophy, political science, psychology, sociology, speech, interdisciplinary humanities and interdisciplinary social sciences — although students with other majors are welcome.

"Students are always surprised to know their potential in the tight job market. We are so vocational in thought," Lowman said.

"The degree is not so important, but how much talent, motivation, drive and quickness the student possesses. These are the keys to getting jobs. They have to sell their skills," she said.

Student aid drops sharply since '80

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Financial aid for college students has plummeted 21 percent — about $2 billion — since the Reagan administration took office in 1980, according to a recently released study by the College Board.

From a high of $18 billion in 1981-82, the amount of financial aid available for students has dropped to a low of just more than $16 billion for the current academic year.

"And that $2 billion decline is even greater when inflation is taken into account," Janice Gams, College Board spokesman, said. "Aid had been cut by one-fifth in inflation-adjusted terms."

Much of the decline is due to cuts the Reagan administration and Congress have made in Social Security benefits for college students, stricter limits on Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) eligibility and a post-Vietnam War drop in the use of veterans' benefits.

In addition, the study reports "a switch in the trend from grants to loans which has been remarkable," Gams said.

In 1970-71, for instance, grants accounted for nearly two-thirds of all financial aid, while loans and work-study benefits accounted for the other third.

By 1975-76, grants constituted over 80 percent of all financial aid expenditures; loans, 17 percent and College Work-Study, 3 percent.

For the current year, however, loans and grants each account for 48 percent of student aid and College Work-Study the remaining 4 percent.

At a time when college financial aid experts are growing increasingly concerned about the level of long-term debt college students are incurring, the decline in the amount of available grant money promises to have far-reaching implications.

At the same time, the early 1980s have seen a major change in the relationship of costs, income and aid for college, the report states. Adjusted for inflation, costs have increased, but income and financial aid per full-time equivalent student have not. The study concludes that college has become more difficult for families to afford in the 1980s.

But the results of the study should also "be put in the context of how much financial aid has really grown over the past years," Gams said.

The federal role in financial aid has indeed swelled in the last two decades, from 40 percent to 80 percent of all aid assistance.

Financial aid from all sources — federal, state and institutions — has skyrocketed from only $546 million in 1963-64 to $4.5 billion in 1979-80 to a high of $18 billion in 1981-82, the study states.

Tuition and room and board at private schools has increased from $2,105 to $8,537 in the last two decades, while the cost of attending a public school rose from $1,026 to $3,403 over the same period, the study states.

Officials cite book waste

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Legislature could save thousands of dollars every year if it stopped giving away two complete sets of law books to the state's 165 legislators, a House committee was told Monday.

Reps. Sanford "Sandy" Duncan and Wanda Fuller, both R-Wichita, told the House Federal and State Affairs Committee there's no reason members of the Legislature should receive two complete sets of statutes every year for free and testified on behalf of bills to eliminate the practice.

Under Duncan's bill, lawmakers would get two complete sets only during their first term in office and then be issued supplementals and replacement books each year of continual service in the Legislature.

"There would be a substantial fiscal savings if we went to this," Duncan told the committee. "In fact, we'd save about $187,200 in the first four years."

The committee took no action on the proposal.

Meese

of the best articulators of Reagan's philosophy..."

Meese's departure from the White House will mean a realignment of the White House staff, which has been beset at the top with friction among the so-called Big Three. Besides Meese, they include chief of staff James A. Baker III and deputy chief of staff Michael K. Deaver.

The main beneficiary was expected to be Baker, leader of the "pragmatic" faction and the bane of conservatives.

When Smith told the president that he wanted to resign to return to his law firm in Los Angeles and to help in Reagan's re-election campaign, the president said "that he certainly would like him to remain in his position, but he understood his reasons for wanting to leave," according to presidential spokesman Larry Speakes.

Speakes said Reagan was surprised "in a way..." but the president has always recognized that members of his Cabinet would have to return to private life at some time.

Speakes said Meese's job as presidential counselor won't be filled.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden, D-Del., ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said, "I have some concern that a controversial political operative like Mr. Meese may be nominated" as attorney general.

Democratic presidential contender Walter F. Mondale said, "Mr. Meese is unfit to be the highest law enforcement official in our land. Based on his record, Mr. Meese's guiding principle appears to be 'with liberty and justice for a few.'"

Meese insisted there were no conflicts between his past role as a political adviser and that of the nation's top law official because "I come into the job without commitments, political or otherwise, to people."

Rise in dropout age necessary

By voting to increase the age for compulsory high school attendance from 16 to 18, or until a student earns his diploma or Graduate Equivalency Diploma, the Kansas Senate will be doing students a favor.

On Jan. 10, Billy McCray, D-Wichita, and Frank Gaines, D-Augusta, introduced legislation for the increase as a means of decreasing the dropout rate in the state, which they estimate to be 25 percent.

Opponents of the measure say students should be allowed to choose whether they attend school. If students are not allowed to drink, vote or be legally responsible for their own actions (in most instances) until age 18, why are they allowed to decide to not get a basic education which could affect the course of their lives?

High school students, while maturing, are still in the process of exploring ideas for their life goals. Although they may be anxious to break away from their home and parents and tout their independence, most who do not complete high school soon realize they acted on emotions instead of logic and do not have the solid foundation of knowledge and experience necessary to succeed in the current job market. They find they are confined to a lifestyle far from the one they saw in their childhood dreams of adulthood.

Material success is not the only aspect of life in which dropouts lose out. By not completing high school, they miss the chance to know themselves through interaction with friends, teachers, and counselors, among others. They never have the opportunity to mature emotionally at a leisurely pace and to gain confidence and pride in themselves and their talents.

College preparatory courses are not for everyone who attends high school. If the bill is made law, educators must put additional effort into exposing students to vocational and other skill-developing programs which would help them meet their personal interests and goals.

For students who must work to help support families, work-study arrangements can be made. Many high schools already have such programs, through which students attend classes a specified number of hours while working in the community part- or full-time. Through use of such programs, students reap the emotional benefits of staying in school while gaining experience which may help them secure a job after graduation.

Opponents also have said that forcing students to remain in school would disrupt the learning environment for serious students. By maintaining discipline in the classroom and offering non-traditional learning opportunities, this concern should be alleviated.

Adoption of special programs for students who are at risk of dropping out has proven successful in some school districts. Manhattan Unified School District No. 383 has used such a program as a way of minimizing the feared discipline problems and making school bearable for students. Such programs offer added academic and social support which make the difference — for some students — between graduating and dropping out.

The benefits students gain by staying in school until age 18 or graduation outweigh the difficulties schools may have in developing creative teaching techniques and programs to encourage a desire to learn.

Black vote may decide election

The Rev. Jesse Jackson's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination may not put him on the ballot in November, but it will definitely affect the outcome of the election.

Jackson himself has admitted that his campaign is "part campaign and part crusade." A top priority is to register as many blacks as possible to vote in time for the March Democratic caucuses. With the example provided by his successful Syrian mission, Jackson is encouraging blacks to participate in the political process.

But evidently, as Jackson said, his staff is "learning." With an inexperienced staff, Jackson has missed the filing deadlines in Nevada, Rhode Island and Puerto Rico. He also is not yet eligible for federal matching campaign funds.

It is widely believed that Jackson cannot and will not secure the Democratic nomination. Nevertheless, he may be victorious in influencing the election in November.

Jackson's crusade to register two million blacks by November could have considerable impact on the Republicans, if Jackson does not secure the nomination and enough of the new voters switch their support to the Democratic nominee.

But if the new black voters abandon presidential politics if Jackson loses the nomination, discouraged from participating, the Democratic bid for the Oval Office may not offer a strong enough challenge to Reagan's impending bid for re-election, necessary to give this race a close finish.

According to a recent Lou Harris-Business Week poll, fully 38 percent of probable voters in November are adamantly opposed to Reagan's re-election. Another 35 percent were determined to be definitely pro-Reagan. The remaining 27 percent undecided, black or not, could be swayed to the Republican fold without a strong Democratic impetus such as Jackson has initiated.

Shultz quickly losing credibility

WASHINGTON — I came home the other night to watch the nightly news. I saw Secretary of State George Shultz condemn the grounding of a U.S. helicopter in Honduras and the killing of the pilot by saying, "It is unacceptable to fire from one country to another country and end up killing some people." Larry Speakes at the White House called the action "reckless and unprovoked." Then, Daniel Ortega, the Nicaraguan chief of state, characterized the flight as anything but "innocent." I believed the Nicaraguan.

Shultz, who will apparently say anything to prove he is not an academic sissy, is fast babbling away his credibility. When it comes to shooting from one country to the next, the United States has been doing that for quite a while. Unless you are the only person in the world who believes that the anti-Sandinista Contras in Honduras are not receiving both CIA money and advice in their war against Nicaragua, then what Shultz said should strike you as preposterous.

Daily, the Contras launch strikes from Honduras into Nicaragua. The Contras have blown up oil depots within Nicaragua and have even managed to bomb the airport at Managua. They are, in effect, conducting a guerrilla war against the Sandinista regime — a war launched at the behest of the United States and financed by it. Just to complete matters, witnesses reported that the downed helicopter not only strayed over Nicaraguan territory, but its American markings were obscured by mud. The Nicaraguans may not have known they were shooting at an American helicopter.

RICHARD COHEN

The issue at the moment is not the advisability of this dirty little war, which is both acknowledged and unacknowledged by our own government. The issue instead is the credibility of our government — its tendency to talk to us the way the Soviet leaders talk to their own people.

For Shultz, though, this is par for the course. He was the first to pop onto the tube after the downing of the Korean airliner — and the first to say things that turned out not to be true. He characterized the downing as something akin to premeditated murder and left us all with a picture of a homicidal Soviet government — one that knew it was dealing with a civilian airliner and one that ordered the trigger pulled from Moscow.

It turned out later that this was not quite the case. It turned out that there had been a U.S. spy plane in the vicinity, that the Soviets might have confused the two planes, that the Soviet pilot might not have recognized the Korean plane as a civilian aircraft (Shultz said he did) and that the order to shoot probably was not given in Moscow, but at regional headquarters. Just recently, for instance, the Soviet armed forces published a critique of the way it handled the Korean airliner incident, indicating not the homicidal intent that Shultz alleged, but something different — a mistake.

Mistakes are inevitable, especially in confusing circumstances. Shultz and the administration can be excused some statements simply because all the facts were not yet in. But even taking that into account, you still have to conclude that they are not above winging it on the facts or striking a ludicrous posture.

In discussing the helicopter incident on television the other night, the Marxist leader of an authoritarian state came off better than two officials of our own democracy. He used a clever media device. He made sense.

In Riley Cornfield, a.d. 2034

"Son," the old man said, "Riley County wasn't always one big cornfield."

"What do you mean, Grandpa?" the little boy asked, as he leaned on the barbed wire fence. They were looking at a sign at the edge of the field that read "RILEY CORNFIELD TRESPASSERS WILL BE VAPORIZED."

"This land wasn't always owned and run by the Corporation. When I was young there were lots — hundreds — of family farms and ranches in this county. And in my grandmother's youth there were twice as many."

"Why did they stop? Didn't they like to farm?"

"Sure they did son, it was their life. But it was mainly out of their control. It was due to economics. The farmers had to get bigger and bigger to survive. This land was so productive that there was always more produced than we needed. Son, you may not understand this, but having a surplus of something keeps the price of that thing cheap. People like cheap food. The farmers kept making less for producing the same amount, so they had to buy more land and produce more just to earn what they had before. You follow me, boy?"

The boy nodded.

"Well," the old man continued, "the machinery companies had to keep making machinery to stay in business. The new machines were always slightly larger and sometimes more efficient than the old ones. Just to survive, the farmer had to buy the new machinery, right? Well, to make the larger machines pay for themselves, the farmer had to buy more land. And to buy both the land and the machinery, he had to go thousands of dollars in debt."

"They gave a specific name to this process, son. They called it progress. And the people who questioned the nature of the process were sometimes referred to as 'anti-economic' people. They said that we were only looking backwards, when I could have sworn we were looking to the future."

DAN ROBISON
Collegian Columnist

"It doesn't take a math professor to see that for some to keep buying, others had to keep selling. In fact farmers were continually 'having a sale' and moving to town to find other jobs. The best managers stayed in business, and the less able managers lost out. And there is nothing wrong with that, boy. That is only fair."

"It wasn't too bad until 1998. The farms were big, but they were still mostly run by families."

"What happened in '98, Grandpa?"

"That was the first year of the Five-Year Drought. Don't you know your history? But even before that, in '93, some K-State professors discovered how to make gasahol from corn cheaply. It soon became the most feasible fuel. Consequently, by '98 corn was the only crop grown around here because it was the only economical one. Then pretty soon, corn equipment was the only kind to be found."

"What about cows, Grandpa?" the boy asked as he looked out over the Flint Hills (he had seen a cow once at the Sunset Zoo.)

"No, son, that was after the Japanese got serious about their livestock genetics. It was no longer economical by then to raise cattle since we could import our beef more cheaply from Japan."

"We used to have a bit of wheat in these parts as well. But Sumner County has just the right conditions, and technology was advanced enough that that one county produced enough wheat for the entire country."

"Anyway, all this area was in corn when the drought hit. Most of the farmers survived the first year. The price of corn was way up and no one expected another year of drought, so everybody planted it again to get out of debt. The second and third years without rain just about finished off all the family farms. They were already way in debt and couldn't afford to buy equipment for a different crop."

"After the fifth year, they were all finished. The land was eroded and everybody was hopelessly in debt. In those days the only people with any money were the computer companies, so they bought up all the agricultural land around. Son, those companies are whizzes with the economy, but they don't know beans about growing food or stewardship of the land. All they do now is produce corn for fuel, which they use to produce corn here and grow wheat down in Sumner County."

"Grandpa, didn't people think that this might happen?"

"Sure they did. When I was in college there were professors who studied agricultural economics for a living. They wrote books about this sort of thing. They documented these trends. But I guess they felt that it was not the place of the University to try to change things. I guess they felt that it was always best to let 'the market' determine the direction of things."

"Well, isn't that the safest thing, Grandpa?"

"Son, people kept saying that, but I don't think the argument was valid. You see, we were affecting the marketplace all along with research and subsidies."

"We bridged a lot about the advance of technology in agriculture. But instead of making the technology alter the economy to make the life we wanted, we let economics determine the technology. And we let both determine our lives."

"Grandpa?"

"Yes, son."

"Did it have to be that way?"

Alumnus advocates funding for coliseum

Editor,
Re: Robert Dubois' guest column, "Funding coliseum raises question of priorities," in the Jan. 13 Collegian.

I was attending K-State at the time the students voted to pledge financial support for a coliseum. The outcome of the vote did indeed prove there was a lack of dissenters in the student body. The measure passed overwhelmingly with the highest voter turnout in school history.

Dubois' proposal to use the $20 million to raise instructors' salaries is unrealistic. If you raise the instructors' salaries this year, how are you going to maintain that salary level? Is Dubois proposing that instructors solicit private funding for their salaries?

The proposal to spend the money on new educational facilities strikes me as funny. Since my last visit to campus, Durland Hall has been expanded, renovation on Nichols Gym has begun, and Throckmorton and Bluemont halls have been completed.

Dubois criticizes the possibility of having empty seating for games. He will soon learn as an alumnus that attending a basketball game without a season ticket at Ahearn is next to impossible. Also, the cry for more student seating, since it is the students' school, could be realized with a new coliseum.

Dubois cried foul over the $16.50 student fee increase. If the student is truly self-supporting and files federal income taxes while he attends K-State, he will indeed realize an eventual tax break (ever heard of income averaging?). If he is not self-supporting then I ask: how many students can honestly say they have not spent at least $16.50 of their parents' money in Aggieville?

While I was attending K-State I paid fees for a new student recreation center. I had no choice, as the students preceeding me voted for the fee increase, but I don't begrudge a dime of that money spent. It was a free choice made by the students.

I support improving education at K-State, but let's not mix apples and oranges. The coliseum was approved by the students, its funding was matched by the alumni, and if I have my facts correct, the Board of Regents won't have to shell out a penny.

I suggest that if Dubois wishes to improve educational facilities that he lead his own private fund-raising campaign, and that he ask the students for fee increases to pay for the buildings.

Actor says bombing was provoked

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — Richard Harris, the Irish actor who takes offense at being referred to as "English," says he thinks the bombing of Harrods department store in London at Christmas by Irish nationalists was wrong, but understandable.

"I'm not saying it's right to bomb Harrods, but the provocation comes from the other side. That arrogant lady (Margaret Thatcher) wants to keep the trouble (in Northern Ireland) going," Harris told the Fort Lauderdale News.

Harris, 53, who often speaks of "the Irish question" on TV talk shows, was interviewed before he opened during the weekend at a Fort Lauderdale theater as King Arthur in "Camelot."

"You talk about the Russians in Afghanistan. If those were Russian troops in Northern Ireland, the United States would consider the IRA freedom fighters," said Harris, who was born in Limerick, Ireland.

Ex-secretary runs helicopter fleet

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Five years ago Marilyn Larson ended a 20-year career as an executive secretary to get married, but found she was bored without her job — so she learned to fly a helicopter and now runs a fleet of three, all pink and white.

She says her new occupation was "never in my wildest dreams." She moved from Phoenix about five years ago to marry hotel executive Mel Larson, who flew a helicopter.

"I flew with Mel, but never really had an interest in learning how to fly," she recalls. "He wanted me to learn how to put the helicopter down and take it off in case he was unable to fly, in case something should happen to him while we were flying."

Then she decided she might as well "learn it all." They started their Action Jetranger Helicopters in August 1980. "I was bored," she said. "I had been a busy professional person and missed the lack of a challenge."

Mrs. Larson, 44, spends most of her time running the company with three full-time and two part-time pilots.

"I'm not licensed to take people on tours," she said. "I just haven't had time to get around to taking the lessons and putting in the required hours to get that type of license."

Police beef up security for officials

BISMARCK, N.D. — Police beefed up security at the Bismarck Civic Center last weekend to protect Gov. Allen Olson and Gov. William Janklow of South Dakota from a vague threat.

Boys high school teams from Bismarck and Pierre, S.D., played in the Governor's Cup on Saturday night and both governors attended.

Authorities had received information from out of state about a vaguely worded threat against "a governor," Col. Norman Evans, superintendent of the North Dakota Highway Patrol, said Monday.

He refused to say where the warning came from or who provided the information. The extra security included four additional police officers and five patrol officers, Evans said.

"We checked out any suspicious persons and provided security inside the building and outside the building to make certain that we were trying to cover all ends," he said.

Center assists students in job search

By BEVERLY MILLER
Collegian Reporter

On-campus job interviews begin today at the Career Planning and Placement Center, but interviews are not the only service offered to students in Holtz Hall.

Career counseling, job-search information and interview and resume assistance are among the other services available to students who register at the center.

"Any student within one year of graduation is encouraged to register," Bruce Laughlin, director of the center, said. "Alumni and former students are considered eligible for career planning and placement services if they have not already registered and have earned eight or more semester hours of credit," he said.

One of the center's services is career counseling and exploration utilizing computers. The resource center, another service, provides students with occupational handbooks, salary information, government-career and job-search materials.

The center also assists students in letter, resume and interview preparation. It provides video-tape equipment for mock interviews, information on specific companies and resume critiquing.

For seniors and graduate students, the center provides job-opportunity information, possible employer contact names, out-of-town classified ads and on-campus interviews.

To be eligible for interviews, a student must register at Holtz Hall and complete a data sheet. This information sheet may function as a resume, or an actual resume may also be included. The student must then consult the Semester Visit List to determine eligibility for and interest in particular employers.

Under the former interviewing system, students competed for interview appointments on a first-come, first-serve basis. Employers had no choice of who they interviewed.

The new system, introduced last fall, allows employers to review students' data sheets, select the applicants they wish to interview and to make their interview choices known to the placement center.

The rest of the process follows a strict schedule. Nine days before an employer is scheduled to visit, the center posts a list of the students selected to be interviewed. Those selected have two days to choose an interview time. Seven days before the interview, any unfilled times may be filled by open sign-ups.

When the new process began, some students feared they might be ignored for interviews because their documented credentials didn't represent them well, although they believed they could make a favorable impression in person, Laughlin said.

"I'm not aware of this happening to any degree," he said.

When a student registers, his packet contains the Placement Manual. The enclosed information explains the services available, gives detailed instructions for completing the registration forms and answers questions frequently asked by personnel at the center.

The manual also includes a list of 50 questions most often asked by employers during interviews.

Ill-prepared and unsuspecting interviewees can lose a competitive edge. Michael Ahern, instructor in marketing, advises his students to approach an interview with the idea of selling themselves. Ahern suggests researching the company conducting the interview, being prepared to ask questions and listening to and dealing honestly with personal strengths and weaknesses.

It is tempting during an interview to ease the stress or tension by talking about such mutually interesting subjects as skiing, hunting or the theater, Ahern said. But, job interviews should be as professional as possible, he said.

Prospective employers are looking for a particular type of personality, Ahern said. They want a person who can work and learn. They can then train the right person with the necessary technical skills.

Club contributes to Speech and Hearing Clinic

Manhattan's Sertoma Club will donate $3,000 to K-State's Speech and Hearing Clinic today for the purchase of additional hearing equipment.

Established nationwide, the Sertoma Club is a community service organization concerned with speech and hearing disorders. Each chapter is dedicated to serve local speech and hearing clinics and often fulfills other community needs as well.

Lillian Larson, assistant professor of speech pathology, said the donated money will be used to purchase a portable, automatic tympanometer which tests the functions of the middle ear, a portable audiometer for the general testing of hearing, and smaller testing equipment for children.

Because the equipment is portable, the Speech and Hearing Clinic, located in Leasure Hall, will be better equipped to serve the community, Larson said.

The clinic currently serves preschools and public schools. Student teachers are sent to public schools to help with the clinic's yearly hearing screening program.

The clinic also offers services at the K-State and Riley County health fairs, the Manhattan Head Start Program and the Lee School Kindergarten Annex.

The money for the hearing equipment was raised by several money-making projects by the Sertoma Club. The main project for the club is the annual pancake feed. This year's pancake feed will be Feb. 4 at the Community House, Fourth Street and Humboldt Street, from 7 a.m. until 4 p.m.

"The Sertoma chapter in Manhattan has donated to Manhattan's recreation parks and financed the construction of the train station at the Sunset Zoo," said Gerald Wilde, professor of entomology and chairman of the chapter's sponsorship committee.

The Manhattan Sertoma Club also has begun a new project — repairing and recycling used hearing aids for Manhattan citizens. For those who meet specific age and financial qualifications, the Sertoma Club offers a free hearing examination, fitting, batteries and a hearing aid.

Whether you realize it or not, you're probably wearing a type of "uniform" right now.

There's nothing wrong with it. But an Army ROTC uniform could make you stand out from the crowd.

Alex Williams, 6-foot-8 freshman from St. Louis, Mo., gains confidence with each game since breaking into the starting line up Jan. 12 against Eastern Washington. Williams scored 12 points to help the 'Cats defeat the visiting Eagles, 64-57. Williams spent his redshirt season increasing his strength, enabling him to add depth to the center position.

'Skins' fans miss celebration

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Some Washington Redskins players returned home Monday, still disappointed over their 38-9 loss to the Los Angeles Raiders in Super Bowl XVIII, the worst defeat in the history of the game.

About a dozen players and wives returned with Redskins' owner Jack Kent Cooke on the 747 jetliner he had chartered last week to fly friends and dignitaries to Sunday's game at Tampa, Fla.

Most of the team's players were not on the flight, including stars such as running back John Riggins and quarterback Joe Theismann, who will play in next Sunday's Pro Bowl Game at Honolulu.

As they arrived in bright sunshine, in the middle of Dulles International Airport, the players were greeted by cheers from a small band of about a dozen fans. Another two dozen fans waited in vain inside the airport terminal, but didn't see the players who traveled from the plane by bus to nearby Redskins Park.

It was a far different scene than last year when the Redskins won the Super Bowl, beating the Miami Dolphins 27-17 and were greeted by a huge crowd at the airport. Cooke was one of the first off the plane, but declined to talk. His players also declined to be interviewed.

But D.C. Mayor Marion Barry, wearing a Redskins' sweatshirt and a red cowboy hat, said, "We're still happy and urge 'Skins fans to attend Wednesday's official welcome home at the Washington Monument."

The district plans a parade along Pennsylvania Avenue and a rally at the Washington Monument Wednesday to honor the team.

"The players weren't negative, they weren't down," Barry said. "We're with the 'Skins when they win and when they lose. They still had a great year (a 16-3 record, the best in the NFL) and they're NFC (National Football Conference) champs," Barry said.

Last year's celebration of the Super Bowl victory over Miami by the Redskins attracted one of the largest parade crowds in Washington history, despite a pouring rain.

Williams beefs up for 'Cats

By JUDI WRIGHT
Staff Writer

It wasn't until the Jan. 12 game against Eastern Washington University that Alex Williams started his first game for K-State. Since then he has been performing at his best to keep the starting position.

Williams didn't play last year as a freshman because he was redshirted — a decision that came at the start of practice for the 1982-83 campaign.

"I needed a lot of improvement on my game," Williams said. "I also needed to become stronger since I was going to be playing at the center position."

From the time he first reported to practices as a Wildcat, Williams has become stronger, increasing his bench press marks from 177 pounds to 250. His once 191-pound frame now tips the scales at 215 pounds.

During early non-conference action, while Williams was still a substitute, he switched off with Eddie Elder and Ben Mitchell to help keep the 'Cats solid at the forward and center positions. He averaged less than 15 minutes of playing time per game, but when he was on the court, he got the job done.

Through K-State's first eleven games and as a substitute, Williams had a .750 field goal percentage with a total of 53 points and 24 rebounds.

Coming off the bench in the Jan. 7 match-up against Northern Iowa University, Williams led all K-State scorers with his career-high 17 points. The most rebounds Williams has had in one contest was seven against U.S. International on Dec. 3.

Now that he has earned his starting position, Williams has continued with the impressive statistics that he recorded as a substitute. He has scored in double figures in three of the four games he has started. His field goal percentage is currently .655 — leading the team — and he now has 35 rebounds for the year.

"It (starting in games) has caused me to play with more enthusiasm and confidence," Williams said. "I'm playing stronger and I feel confident with myself as a player."

Before coming to K-State, Williams led his team, O'Fallon Tech in St. Louis, in scoring with 19 points per game — shooting 55 percent from the field and 77 percent from the charity stripe. He also averaged 17 rebounds per game to lead the state in that area.

Williams came to K-State following his days at O'Fallon Tech after being approached by other schools, including the University of Missouri, Arkansas State University, Texas A & M and Iowa State University.

"I chose K-State over the others really because of Coach Hartman and because of other St. Louis players that have come to K-State," Williams said. "There was also a winning tradition at K-State."

Two St. Louis players Williams played against in high school — Jonas Cody from Vashon High School and Tyrone Jackson from Lincoln High School — became his teammates.

"Tyrone and I always had some good battles. His team always won the games, but I won some scoring battles," Williams said.

Williams is majoring in electrical engineering, and he said it is important for him to keep a good balance between studying and playing basketball. His main goal is to "get through engineering and still play good basketball."

NCAA sets minimum sports rule

By DAVID SVOBODA
Collegian Reporter

Schools in Division I of the National Collegiate Athletic Association, including K-State, will be required to sponsor a minimum number of sports for both men and women by the beginning of the 1988-1989 academic year.

Until the ruling was passed at the annual convention of the association in Dallas earlier this month, NCAA member schools were required to sponsor a minimum number of teams only for men.

According to K-State Athletic Director Dick Towers, the Wildcat athletic program is already in compliance with the new ruling, which requires Division I schools to sponsor eight women's teams by the 1988-1989 school year.

The eight sports in which women athletes compete for K-State are cross country, indoor track, outdoor track, golf, tennis, softball, volleyball and basketball.

"What we have tried to do over the past few years in the Big Eight is to establish a conference schedule in which all teams would play each other," Towers said. "But to ask a team from Colorado to go all the way to Iowa State to play a women's softball game would put them at a financial hardship."

It is the threat of financial hardship that has some athletic directors and college presidents worrying about the new ruling, Towers said.

"The schools with the biggest concerns are those classified 'Division I-other', meaning they don't have a football program," he said.

Without football, one of the greatest revenue producers for athletic programs in the NCAA, schools in the "other" portion of the NCAA, such as DePaul, Georgetown and Marquette, will have a hard time meeting the minimum standards in the next five years.

KTA seeks funds to improve turnpike

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Turnpike Authority is seriously considering refinancing the 236-mile toll road through a new $100 million bond issue, The Associated Press learned Monday.

The money from the new bonds would be used to rebuild not only the turnpike, but also the 18th Street Expressway in suburban Kansas City.

Turnpike General Manager R.D. "Rod" Fogo and three of the five members of the authority confirmed in interviews that the KTA has been studying for more than a year a plan to obtain money they say is badly needed to put the turnpike and the expressway back into good condition.

Senate Majority Leader Robert Talkington of Topeka, House Transportation Committee Chairman Rex Crowell of Longton and Transportation Secretary John Kemp, members of the KTA by virtue of their legislative and administrative positions, all talked favorably about the refinancing plan.

They said it may be the only way to rebuild the turnpike and its bridges, which are now 28 years old, while bringing the four-lane road up to modern safety standards and maintaining it in the future. The state, in all likelihood, won't be in a financial position to take it over in 1994 when the original bonds are due to be paid off.

If the refinancing plan goes through, it will mean those who use the turnpike can expect to pay for the privilege for another 30 or 40 years.

The refinancing is not expected to have any immediate effect on tolls charged on the turnpike, but those interviewed said future maintenance needs of the road almost certainly will force higher tolls at various times in years to come.

The final decision is not expected for at least six weeks, and will not be made until the KTA's general consulting engineers, Howard, Needles, Tammen and Bergendorff of Kansas City deliver the final version of a longterm needs study commissioned by the authority.

However, the KTA approved a contract last June with Stern Brothers & Co. of Kansas City, to act as bond consultants on the $100 million issue being contemplated.

The toll road, which stretches from Kansas City on the northeast to the Oklahoma border south of Wichita, was built in a crash program in just two years, 1955-56.

The original pike was built from a $160 million bond issue sold in 1954. The rate of interest on that issue was 33.8 percent.

The 18th Street Expressway, which at the time provided the only major highway link between Wyandotte and Johnson Counties in the western suburbs of Kansas City, was added through a second bond issue of $20 million at a 5 percent interest in 1964.

After other major interstate arteries were opened around the western Kansas City beltline in the 1970s, toll revenues on the 18th Street Expressway plummeted because motorists chose to use the free routes, and the expressway no longer paid its way.

To salvage the expressway, which neither the state Department of Transportation nor local units of government in the Kansas City area wanted to take over, the KTA refinanced in 1978, issuing another $27.8 million in bonds at 6.1 percent interest. Part of that money was used to pay off the 1964 bond issue.

Now, the Turnpike Authority is faced with even bigger problems. Both the turnpike itself and the expressway are in dire need of major renovation, especially the decks of their bridges. There is not enough money generated from tolls to finance the kind of rebuilding program that is needed.

The only alternative, those interviewed said, may be to refinance.

Planned food price hikes prompt riots in Morocco

By The Associated Press

RABAT, Morocco — At least 60 people were killed in riots against planned food price hikes in Morocco, diplomatic sources said Monday, prompting King Hassan II to cancel the measures.

The government made no announcement on casualties. But diplomatic sources, who requested anonymity, said the death toll from disorders last week included 20 dead in Tetouan, 20 in Nador, 15 in Al Hoceima and three in Fez, all northern cities on the Mediterranean coast.

They said two demonstrators were killed during student demonstrations in Marrakesh in central Morocco.

Spanish press reports that as many as 200 were killed on the coast, a former Spanish colony, were "greatly exaggerated," they said.

But by Monday calm was reported throughout the country.

In his Sunday night speech, the king canceled scheduled food price hikes and denied rumors of increased education fees, saying all primary and secondary education would remain free.

Widespread rumors of increases in both areas had fanned the flames in this normally placid North African Arab nation. Concern over hiking the price of basic foods had only weeks before shaken Tunisia, whose people, like those in Morocco, enjoy a greater amount of personal freedom and democracy than those in much of the region.

At least 100 people were reported killed in Tunisia when a week of riots began Dec. 29 with the announcement that the price of bread would double. President Habib Bourguiba canceled announced food price increases on Jan. 6 and was hailed as a hero.

News from Tunisia may have sparked the first protests in Morocco, in Fez and Marrakesh, where there were rumors of big exam fees.

Many local police were in Casablanca, called there as security for last week's Islamic summit conference which Hassan was hosting. The army, unskilled in crowd control, fired on demonstrators, diplomatic reports said. Word of the deaths spread quickly, sparking new riots.

Students in the north were joined by crowds from the poorest areas, who had heard there were to be steep hikes in basic food prices.

The rioting spread to other cities of the dirt-poor Rif mountain region along the Mediterranean, where recent crackdowns on smuggling and hashish trafficking cut into traditional sources of income.

Diplomatic sources said as disturbances grew, Hassan ordered the army to do whatever necessary to quell the riots, and by Monday morning, order had been restored.

As Tunisian officials in private blamed agitators from neighboring Libya for the riots there, Hassan said Sunday night that Morocco's unrest was caused by communists, Israelis and Iranians.

Supreme Court lifts death penalty restraints

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, in its latest venture into the legal quagmire of capital punishment, made it easier Monday for states to send convicted murderers to their deaths.

The justices ruled, 7-2, that death sentences may be meted out even when state courts do not try to determine whether others convicted of similar crimes were treated more leniently.

In the opinion, Justice Byron R. White wrote the Constitution's bar against cruel and unusual punishment require no "comparative proportionality review" that a lower court demanded for every death penalty case.

The decision reinstated death sentence of California murderer Robert Alton Harris for the 1978 slayings of two teen-agers in San Diego.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had thrown it out, saying a proportionality review was needed to ensure Harris was not being punished arbitrarily. The Supreme Court reversed that ruling.

It may be months before the ultimate effect of Monday's decision on the nearly 1,300 men and women on death rows nationwide is assessed.

But aside from reinstating Harris' execution, the ruling could have immediate effect in Texas, where some 170 people are on death row.

Three months ago White spared the life of condemned murderer James David Autry, who was already strapped to a wheeled cot in the Texas death house awaiting a lethal injection. The last-gasp legal argument raised by Autry's lawyers was comparative proportionality review, and White said he should be kept alive until the case was decided.

Texas officials said White's order basically blocked all executions. The state now apparently may reschedule his and others' executions.

Justices William J. Brennan and Thurgood Marshall, who are opposed to capital punishment under all circumstances, dissented.

In other matters Monday, the court:

—Struck down a ruling that would have forced Pennsylvania to close down its once-notorious Pennhurst Center for the mentally handicapped.

—Left intact a ruling that stripped 73-year-old Conrad Schellong of Chicago of his U.S. citizenship because he never told immigration officials about his service as a Nazi concentration camp guard before World War II.

Calendar models acquire exposure, support charity funds

By CARA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

When Scott Mueller was asked to pose for a calendar photo with a ring box and flowers, he said the ring box had to go.

"I'm not ready for that yet," Mueller said.

The ring box went.

Mueller, senior in agricultural economics and February model, is one student who appears on one of two K-State calendars. The "Men of K-State" calendar supports the Ann Jorns Scholarship Fund for undergraduate women, while the profits from "The Best of K-State" calendar go to the Children's National Fund for the Hungry and the Kelly Jackson Memorial Fund sponsored by Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity.

"Four years ago someone came up with the idea," Susan Stone, junior in modern languages, said. Stone is service projects chairman for Delta Delta Delta sorority, which organizes the "Men of K-State" calendar.

"We made about $1,400 last year. This year we doubled our printing in hopes of also doubling profit," Stone said. Currently about 1,200 copies of the 2,000 printed have been sold.

"We're not looking for a certain type (of man to appear in the calendar). We try not to get all blonds. We aren't trying to put all fraternity men in," Stone said.

"Some hesitated when they were first asked," Stone said. "But when they found out some of their friends were doing it, they said OK."

"I was shocked," Mueller said. "I'd heard rumors that I took with a grain of salt, but when I got the letter, I took it pretty seriously. For just a small time you are put in the spotlight. You have to go for that once in a while."

Jeff Mills, senior in physical education and model for July, said, "It was different being in front of the camera like that. I haven't done any modeling before. I didn't hear I was going to be by the pool right away. When I was told, that's when I had apprehensions."

"In a way I liked the modeling, but in a way I was glad it was over. Rob (Clark, the photographer) made it easy. It didn't seem like he took 72 pictures," Mueller said. "I'm kind of a bashful person. I think people who had done it (modeling) before would have felt more comfortable."

Mills said, "My family thought it was all right. I got a bit of razzing from my dad, and I think my mom gave some away."

Both mentioned getting teased by their friends. "You get a lot of comments like 'Aren't you a pretty boy,'" Mueller said.

In addition to comments from friends and family, the models had to deal with the media.

"I don't like the media part that goes with it. It's dealing with ego. I feel like I owe someone more than a thanks when they come up and say 'I like your photo.' I don't know what to say back," Mueller said. "I'm glad I got the recognition and honor, but, I really don't know how to handle the comments."

"The Best of K-State" calendar spotlights selected campus women.

"I felt flattered," Shawna Lawrence, junior in business marketing and April model, said. "I didn't know who Rob was, so he picked me out of the crowd. It was just something fun and exciting to do, something I had always wanted to do, more than taking it like 'Oh Wow! I'm on a calendar.'"

"I knew Rob was working on it and was glad when he asked me," Jenny Garner, junior in history and August model, said. "I didn't consider saying no, but if it had not been for a friend or a good cause I would have said definitely no."

Neither Lawrence nor Garner were experienced models, though Lawrence had done some modeling for her hometown stores.

"It was hard for me at first because I'm used to pictures where you just pose. The camera was clicking constantly. You just couldn't paste a smile on," Lawrence said.

For Garner, who posed in a bikini, her unfamiliarity with modeling and the climate posed difficulties in getting a good photograph.

"It was fun, except that it was freezing. We ended up doing it three times. The last time was the end of October. I had wet hair and I was in a bikini by the river," she said.

"He (Clark) tries to make the girls feel beautiful," Garner said. "It was hard to sit there and look sultry."

Clippings from magazines were used to help the models attain the desired pose.

"He (Clark) showed me a picture of Christie Brinkley," Garner said. "In fact my pose was almost exactly like one of Christie Brinkley's."

"Rob had ideas, and I was glad because I had no ideas," Lawrence said. "He originally had me in a 'Flashdance' outfit, which wasn't me. He then put me in a sweater, 501's (Levis), and boots. I felt more comfortable. It's a lot easier to model when you're being yourself."

The adjustment to their roles as models was made not only by the girls, but also by their families and friends.

"A lot of my male friends gave me a lot of ribbing, but it was real friendly. My family mostly thought it was funny. They just laughed and didn't really comment," Garner said.

With the initial excitement of modeling over, the possibility of pursuing it as a career remains. Garner and Lawrence said that neither of them would consider modeling as a career.

"I would probably do it again if I got asked, but it would be on the side for fun," Lawrence said. "Basically anybody can model with good photographers and makeup."

Meese supports strict law enforcement issues

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — When he was a deputy district attorney back in Alameda County, Calif., Edwin Meese III spent much of his spare time riding in patrol cars.

At home, he'd tune into police radios as a sort of background music. Nearby was his collection of pig figurines — a symbol of the derogatory term radicals applied to the police back when Meese was battling protesters at Berkeley.

Meese, the longtime confidant and counselor to President Reagan, was tapped Monday by Reagan to succeed William French Smith as attorney general.

As a conservative following a conservative, Meese is not likely to initiate any sharp changes of direction. But he will have the chance to apply his ideas about law enforcement matters on a national scale if he wins Senate confirmation. Law enforcement and police work are lifelong interests, almost passions.

He'd be a tough law-and-order man at the Justice Department and, judging by his record, one bound to plunge into occasional controversy. He has strong opinions and not much of an inclination for sugar-coating them into soft-sounding platitudes.

He is for capital punishment, for closing down the government-funded program which provides lawyers to poor people, for denying parole boards the power to shorten some sentences.

He favors giving judges additional power to detain suspects before trial, relaxing rules on what evidence can be admitted in trials, and, it appears likely, amending the Constitution to allow victims of crime to be present and to be heard when accused people go on trial.

The constitutional amendment attracted little attention when it was proposed early last year by the President's Task Force on Victims of Crime. Meese, who believes the government should compensate the victims of crime, played a key role in assembling the panel and closely followed its deliberations. It was chaired by a friend of his, Lois Haight Herrington, a former prosecutor, now an assistant attorney general.

The proposed amendment would work a fundamental change in criminal trials at the local, state and federal level. The victim of a crime would have a table in the courtroom like the prosecutor's and defendant's. The victim, or his lawyer, presumably could cross-examine witnesses and appeal to the jury for punishment.

The idea hasn't gotten anywhere, but with Meese at justice, the entire area of victims' rights and victims' compensation could come in for a new airing. The task force found that the nation's system of justice "protects the criminal while turning its back on the innocent victim."

Meese favors relaxing the "exclusionary rule" that forbids the use of evidence against defendants that was gathered by illegal searches and seizures.

The rule is "an absurdity in the name of justice," said Meese, who believes that evidence should be admitted if police were acting in reasonably good faith.

Almost everyone knows of the uproar that followed Meese's pre-Christmas reflections on hungry Americans — they go to soup lines because the food there is free, he said — but he has raised eyebrows before with off-the-cuff statements.

For example, Meese suggested on a television interview show that reporters who print classified materials leaked to them are guilty of receiving stolen property and should be prosecuted.

Before coming to Washington, Meese founded and directed The Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management at the University of San Diego Law School, a research center for criminal law.

Fourteen months after taking his White House job, Meese returned to California and made a speech in which he characterized the American Civil Liberties Union, which has defended unpopular causes of every sort, as part of a "criminals' lobby" and "another reason why crime has continued to increase."

So great was the outcry that both the White House and Attorney General William French Smith disassociated themselves from Meese's remark.

Meese was Ronald Reagan's closest aide during Reagan's days as governor of California. He served as Reagan's on-the-scene representative when violence erupted in 1969 at San Francisco State College and the University of California at Berkeley.

At Meese's urging, Reagan declared a state of emergency when Berkeley protesters demanded that a tract of land be turned into a "people's park."

Meese supervised the arrest of 700 "free speech movement" demonstrators. One of them, James Rector, was shot by a sheriff's deputy who said Rector had been throwing rocks.

Ten years later, Meese was asked about the incident, and said, simply, "James Rector deserved to die."

His view was the anti-war campus uprisings of the era constituted "the greatest threat to academic freedom." He testified in Washington in 1966 in favor of a bill to make it a crime to aid Communist forces in Vietnam. "Basically those demonstrations prolonged the war and cost a lot of American lives," he said.

Researcher criticizes plan for radiation safety limits

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A leading research scientist has sharply criticized the Environmental Protection Agency's program to set safety limits for radio-frequency and microwave radiation.

The researcher, W. Ross Adey, charged that a major EPA report on biological effects of this type of radiation was riddled with scientific flaws which may "grievously impede" the development of a prudent and widely acceptable safety standard.

Adey, who has done pioneering research into brain metabolism changes caused by weak electromagnetic fields, said the draft document and a scientific panel formed by EPA to review it have largely disregarded important new experimental findings.

"There is now unequivocal evidence that many significant neurologic, endocrine and immunologic responses occur in living tissues" at radiation power levels below those needed to produce heating effects, Adey said in a bluntly-worded letter to EPA Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus.

The 11-member scientific panel reviewing the EPA report is meeting Tuesday and Wednesday at the agency's National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences in Research Triangle Park, N.C.

EPA officials estimate that more than 2 million Americans are chronically exposed to radio-frequency and microwave radiation at intensities exceeding one micro-watt per square centimeter, several orders of magnitude more than natural background levels.

Also, federal monitoring surveys have found that power levels in publicly accessible areas adjacent to some broadcast transmitters can climb much higher, up to several thousand micro-watts.

In addition to this country's more than 10,000 radio and TV stations, other sources of electromagnetic radiation include radar, microwave relay towers, and power transmission lines generating strong low-frequency fields.

The 500-page EPA draft report surveying biological effects of radio-frequency and microwave radiation concluded that there was a lack of "convincing evidence" for effects on blood and the infection-fighting immune system "without some form of thermal involvement."

Mahaffey

ways. "If (Mahaffey) had given any willingness to work with the administration, then things could have been worked out. But he has never had the willingness to change."

Testifying for Mahaffey was Dan McLean, a former forestry department faculty member from August 1974 to August 1977. McLean claimed the complaints against Mahaffey were typical student complaints, like those he received while head of the Department of Leisure Studies at Iowa State University from 1977 to 1983.

McLean also placed Mahaffey in the top 5 percent of the professors he has known and said if he was in the position now to hire a faculty member, Mahaffey would be one of his top candidates.

But Richard Seaton, University attorney, asked if it wasn't possible for Mahaffey to have changed since 1977.

"I guess anything's possible," McLean said.

U.S. fleet in Mideast acquires missiles

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Stinger shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missiles have been sent to some ships in the U.S. fleet off Lebanon and near the mouth of the Persian Gulf to increase the fleet's protection against possible kamikaze suicide attacks, a Pentagon spokesman acknowledged Tuesday.

It was understood that the Stingers, bazooka-like weapons for defense against low-altitude air attack, are being placed primarily on amphibious ships and auxiliaries which lack the anti-aircraft armament with which warships are equipped.

Pentagon spokesman Michael Burch said the Stingers, which are normally used by the Army and Marines, were requested by commanders because of concern about an increased threat of suicide attacks against U.S. ships, possibly by small planes that may be flown either by Iranians or Syrian-backed fighters.

Burch said the fleet in the Mideast region, which was defined as the waters off Lebanon, and in the Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf has been placed on an "increased state of readiness" because of some intelligence reports of possible suicide strikes.

He spoke of this possibility as "a new dimension" in the tense atmosphere off Lebanon, as well as in the Persian Gulf-Indian Ocean area.

White House sources told some reporters late last week that the United States had received intelligence information indicating that the Iranians might use small, propeller-driven planes to send suicide pilots smashing into American ships, in a way comparable to Japanese kamikaze assaults in World War II.

These officials indicated there were reports from agents that the Iranians were training some revolutionary guards to fly the planes.

Defense officials, who spoke only on condition they remain anonymous, said there is no hard evidence of any such planes arriving in areas of Lebanon dominated by the Syrians and some Iranians.

However, as Burch put it, "we recognize there is the potential for a terrorist-type attack against ships of the fleet" and that the increased vigilance, as well as the shipment of Stinger missiles, are precautionary measures.

Burch declined to discuss the number of Stingers sent to the fleet nor the ships which received them, although he implied that some older combatant vessels were getting them along with amphibious ships and auxiliaries.

The Stinger, which is about five feet long and weighs about 34.5 pounds, is designed to hit aircraft at a distance of about three miles. The missile travels at supersonic speeds and homes in on the heat generated by the engines of its targets.

President to endorse future space station

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan will endorse in his State of the Union speech tonight a manned orbiting station as the cornerstone of this nation's future in space, government sources reported Tuesday.

The station, to be operational early in the next decade, would signal a permanent U.S. presence in space and could expand to such objectives as a manned lunar base and expeditions to Mars, said the sources, who asked to remain anonymous.

There was no comment from the White House or the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. However, NASA has scheduled a news briefing Thursday on "State of the Union proposals."

White House science adviser George A. Keyworth said recently that the president wants to "recapitulate the vision of Apollo" and maintain U.S. leadership in space at a time when the Soviet Union is pursuing ambitious space plans.

A bold commitment to a long-range program centered on a space station would be the first major space declaration by the United States since President Kennedy declared in 1961 that an American should land on the moon before the end of that decade.

As a down payment on the $8 billion station, Reagan is asking for about $150 million in his proposed fiscal 1985 budget, which goes to Congress Feb. 1, the sources reported.

Preliminary 1985 spending projections given earlier this month to Republican congressmen by budget director David Stockman show the administration wants to add $6 billion to NASA's budget over the next five years, principally for developing a station. That's a large increase for an agency whose budget has been between $6 billion and $7 billion annually and which has seen some lean years since the glory days of the Apollo moon flights.

The sources said Reagan, in his speech, will urge Congress to support a station as a means of moving the United States ahead commercially and technologically in space.

Reagan is expected to cite the commercial opportunities offered by a space station. A station also could be used as a scientific platform for viewing the stars and planets, as well as the Earth and its atmosphere. And it could enhance national security by providing a military reconnaissance platform overflying most areas of the globe.

Under the Reagan plan, a station supporting six to eight men and women would be operational in 1991 or 1992.

Several American industrial firms and the governments of many European countries and Japan have expressed an interest in contributing to a U.S. space station, and NASA has been exploring joint ventures with several companies and foreign officials.

The Soviets have flown several preliminary space stations, keeping men aloft for as many as 211 days. Soviet officials have said their goal is a permanent station, manned initially by six persons in 1986.

Andropov sets terms for arms talks

Soviets demand 'equal footing'

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Soviet leader Yuri V. Andropov said he agrees with President Reagan's call for a U.S.-Soviet dialogue, but only if Washington stops trying to conduct talks "from positions of threats and pressure," the official Tass news agency said Tuesday.

Andropov also complained that Reagan's Jan. 16 speech on U.S.-Soviet relations "does not contain a single new idea" and said any new discussions must be aimed at reaching "concrete accords."

He also repeated the Soviet refusal to resume talks on limiting medium-range nuclear missiles unless newly deployed U.S. rockets in Europe are dismantled.

Tass said his comments were in an interview that would be published in today's editions of Pravda, the Communist Party daily.

"There is no need to convince us of the usefulness and expedience of dialogue," Andropov said. "This is our policy. But the dialogue should be conducted on an equal footing and not from a position of strength, as it is proposed by Ronald Reagan."

"This dialogue should not be conducted for the sake of dialogue. It should be directed at the attainment of concrete accords."

It was the first public word from the ailing leader since Jan. 12, when Tass said his reply to a French peace group on the Geneva talks on medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe was delivered. It restated the position that the Soviets will resume negotiations if the NATO abandons its plan to deploy 572 cruise and Pershing 2 missiles in Western Europe and dismantles any already in place.

Andropov's last major foreign or domestic policy statement was made Dec. 26, when the text of his written address to the Communist Party Central Committee was published.

Andropov, 69, said at the time that "temporary reasons" prevented him from delivering the speech in person. Andropov, who has been reported suffering from kidney problems, has not been seen in public since Aug. 18 when he met with a

Former supervisor testifies, defends petition circulation

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

John Strickler, assistant state extension forester, defended the issuance of a 1980 Department of Forestry faculty petition Tuesday at the appeal hearing for fired tenured associate professor Ben Mahaffey. The petition supported the University in Mahaffey's third faculty grievance.

Strickler said he wrote the petition, which expressed concern over the amount of department time being spent on the Mahaffey grievances and disputed the complaints Mahaffey made. The department was presented as being in an "uproar" during the grievance hearings, he said. He said he was frustrated by the attention the department was receiving by the news media.

Bill Loucks, associate professor of forestry, volunteered to take the petition to all but one faculty member to be read and signed if they concurred. The one forestry department member who did not sign was Gene Grey, professor of forestry, who was on assignment in Washington, D.C., at the time.

In a two-day swing around the state, Loucks used a forestry department vehicle to take the petition to extension foresters in various cities. Strickler said, Loucks testified Thursday that he had made the trip.

When questioned about using a department vehicle for the trip, Strickler said he believed the trip was department business.

"As far as I'm concerned, it was a personnel matter and it was official business. It was on official stationery. It never entered my mind," said Strickler, who authorized the trip.

Mahaffey's attorney, David Schauner, questioned the peer pressure the petition might have created when forestry professors saw who had already signed the petition. When the sixth or seventh faculty member saw who had already signed the petition, he said, they might feel pressured into also signing.

But a condition of obtaining the signatures was that if any faculty member objected to the petition and did not sign, the petition would be destroyed, Strickler said. He added that he signed the petition last to avoid any chance of pressuring faculty members into signing the petition because he was their supervisor.

The administration's case was interrupted twice Tuesday to accommodate scheduling of witnesses for Mahaffey. First to testify was Paul Fisher, former head of the Department of Computer Science and now president of Computer and Information Sciences, 2316 Anderson.

Currently working for Computer and Information Sciences, Mahaffey first worked with Fisher in 1982 in the computer science department as an administrative assistant. Flooded by an increasing enrollment, the

A consulting firm told the Manhattan City Commission Tuesday that city officials are undisciplined in some of their salary procedures and that their current job appraisal system needs refinement.

Swedes seize U.S. shipment

By The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Customs agents in southern Sweden halted and impounded a shipment of sophisticated U.S. optical equipment bound for East Germany, a spokesman said Tuesday.

Experts were called to Malmo, where the seven boxes were seized, to determine if their contents should be considered military equipment, the Swedish customs spokesman said by telephone from Malmo.

Sweden returned tons of Diane Kelly, of Hay Associates, said the city has been undisciplined in some cases because some city employees' salaries don't coincide with the level of their jobs. Some non-exempt positions — those requiring overtime pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act — have twice the job content as other positions but receive only 35 percent more salary, Kelly said.

"As jobs get higher, one would hope they would have more salary opportunity," Kelly said. "They do have additional salary opportunity, but only gradually. It's not a steep line."

Lower-level, non-exempt city positions are above the average in the local market, but as job responsibility increases, salaries start falling below the market average, which results in a pay scale that doesn't increase with the positions employees hold, Kelly said.

City officials conducted the survey among non-exempt employees under the supervision of Hay Associates, who did research on exempt employees.

Some employees aren't being paid the average minimum level and some are over the average maximum point in the non-exempt bracket of the local job market, Kelly said. The jobs above the maximum average tend to be further over the maximum than those positioned from the minimum, she said.

The firm originally suggested the city increase salaries of the upper-portion employees who aren't being paid according to job content and not raise salaries of lower-level workers because the city is above average in that category, Kelly said.

An across-the-board, five-percent pay increase at the first of January made the situation worse, Kelly said. The firm maintains that its original suggestions should still be applied. The firm's immediate suggestion is to increase salaries of those below the minimum average, which would cost the city $538, she said.

The cost of getting all non-exempt employees to 100 percent of the midpoint is $12,800, she said.

Exempt jobs — management positions — are much closer to state and regional averages than non-exempt jobs are to local averages, Kelly said. Lower-level exempt positions lagged 11 percent behind averages, while senior management positions are behind only 3 percent. The cost to remedy that situation is $41,000, she said.

Kelly said the city needs to decide if not meeting the averages is causing problems recruiting and keeping employees.

The current city salary appraisal system, Kelly said, needs to be based more on specific job performance than the current system which rewards employees for items for which they already are paid, such as attitude, punctuality and dress.

While there isn't anything seriously wrong with the practice, the city might run into difficulty if a person were fired based on the current system, said Tom Flannery, another member of the firm.

In other action, the commission voted 4-1 to extend Forest City Enterprises' downtown redevelopment agreement which expires Feb. 3. City Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood voted against the extension.

Candidates' filing forms due today

The deadline for candidates to file for Student Body President, Student Senate and Board of Student Publications is 5 p.m. today.

All applications must be turned in at Holton 102.

According to the Student Governing Association Constitution, all students who are recognized as full-time students for fee purposes are eligible to run for office.

The only exceptions to this qualification are that graduate students enrolled in six or more hours are eligible to become student senators, and membership on the Board of Student Publications is limited to undergraduates.

The constitution also states that students who will graduate the semester or summer after spring elections may not run for office.

Acker honors scholarship winners

K-State will distribute nearly a quarter of a million dollars next year to 262 of Kansas' most scholarly high school graduating seniors.

President Duane Acker will honor these students and their parents Friday at Scholarship Day.

There were 1,509 high school seniors who vied for the University's most prestigious awards to entering freshmen. Competitive examinations, class rank and overall high school grades were the selection criteria.

Individual awards of $1,000 will go to 92 Putnam Scholars and 39 Foundation Scholars, and $700 awards will be given to each of 131 University Scholars. Bequests and gifts to the KSU Foundation made the scholarships possible.

Students who receive the Putnam and Foundation scholarships may have their awards renewed for four years. The $700 awards, however, are one-time scholarships.

The high school students participating in Scholarship Day will attend seminars taught by K-State professors. Program topics include "Nuclear Power" and "Cancer Research".

The students and their parents will be guests of the University at an 11:30 a.m. banquet in the Union Ballroom.

President Acker will present award certificates at the affair.

Sororities rush for new members

Although the major Greek rush at K-State is held before the fall semester, rush is also held at the beginning of the spring semester. Open Rush is being held by three sororities, Barbara Robel, greek affairs adviser, said. Each spring, any sorority may rush, she said.

This spring, Alpha Chi Omega, Alpha Delta Pi and Kappa Delta sororities are rushing for new members to their houses.

Registration for Open Rush is open until Jan. 27 in Room 203, Holton Hall. Registrants must pay a $3 fee.

Robel said names of registrants will be given to each of the houses. Girls who register will be contacted by a member of the house. On Feb. 13, invitations to pledge will be sent out by the sororities, she said.

Seminar features concrete design

A day-long seminar on the design and construction of concrete walls will be held at K-State Feb. 2 at the seventh annual Scholar Conference and Concrete Exposition.

The morning's program at the Union will feature Peter Courtois, chairman of the form work committee for the American Concrete Institute, the organization which sets industry standards.

Jerome Ford, accessories product manager for the Symonds Corporation in Des Plaines, Ill. also will speak Thursday. He is an industry expert in dealing with the problems causing the collapse of concrete forms during construction.

Jo Coke, sales manager for the central midwestern branch of Gifford-Hill Inc., Kansas City, also will give a presentation Thursday morning. In Weber Arena in the afternoon she will demonstrate the use of chemicals which improve the flowing qualities of concrete.

Approximately 400 representatives of the Kansas construction industry are expected, including contractors, suppliers, architects, homebuilders and engineers, as well as public works officials and building inspectors.

The conference is sponsored by the Departments of Civil Engineering, Architectural Engineering and Construction Science. It is hosted by the Division of Continuing Education.

Los Angeles' Mayor Bradley postpones Landon Lecture

The date of the Landon Lecture Series featuring Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley has been changed to April 16.

Bradley's lecture was formerly scheduled for Feb. 3. In an effort to space the three lectures for this spring more evenly and to fit Bradley's schedule, the lecture has been postponed.

The other two lecture series' guests are Sen. Edward (Ted) Kennedy, who will speak on Jan. 30, and Hodding Carter III, who will visit Feb. 13.

William Richter, professor of political science and coordinator of the lecture series, said the selection of Bradley was based on his prominence as mayor of the second largest city in the United States, his reputation as a leader in black politics, and his past participation in the California gubernatorial race.

Putnam Hall fireplace cold since May storm

Putnam Hall residents are unable to use a fireplace which was damaged by lightning last May, along with an electrical transformer, until long-awaited repairs can be made.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, said the delay in repairs is due to the number of procedures which had to be followed before a contractor was hired to repair the chimney. The same procedures were not necessary for the electrical damages, he said, adding that it was vital the transformer be repaired immediately after the incident.

"The process necessary to initiate repairs to the chimney are both detailed and time consuming," Frith said. It begins with the writing of specifications which consider all the possible expenses and problems which may be incurred during repair, including hidden problem areas such as a weakened support, he said.

After the specifications are determined they are sent to the state architect for approval, who then opens the repair job for bidding.

All of the paperwork necessary for the repair to the chimney of Putnam Hall has been completed, Frith said. The contractor, Russell Weisbender Construction Co. of Manhattan, cannot begin work until the weather improves.

Lloyd Davenport, superintendent of maintenance, said total damages to the electrical equipment and the chimney amounted to $39,486.60.

While debris from the accident still lies in a fenced-in area along the south side of the building, the only complaints Emily Weinacker, graduate in education and guidance and director of Putnam Hall, said she has received concerning the chimney have been regarding the idle fireplace.

"The fence will stay up around the debris as a safety measure to keep possible falling debris from causing harm to curious passersby," Frith said.

Mahaffey

department needed administrative help and Fisher asked Mahaffey to assist. Mahaffey first produced a "fairly superior" slide show to be shown to high school students as a department recruiting tool, Fisher said.

Mahaffey did not teach computer classes, but helped administratively for about five hours each week.

Fisher described Mahaffey as "prickly," saying he first met Mahaffey when the man challenged a speech Fisher had just given at a meeting, shortly after Mahaffey came to K-State. Mahaffey is direct in his actions, he said, but one has to consider his ideas to see that he is sincere.

"Prickly — in the sense that if you want to grab hold of him and drag him somewhere, you're going to wind up like you just wrapped your arms around a cactus," Fisher said. "But if you talk to him..."

Fisher described the student complaints against Mahaffey as typical, saying "If you give people the opportunity to complain, they will complain."

Mahaffey has worked only with women at Computer Information and Sciences, Fisher said, and in that time Fisher said he has had no complaints about Mahaffey making sexist comments.

When asked about Mahaffey being fired for the charge of professional incompetence, he replied, "I think that's a joke."

Also testifying for Mahaffey was Bruce Boardman, of Roanoke, Texas, who met Mahaffey in October 1979 at a regional meeting of the Association of Interpretive Naturalists. Boardman said he had once lectured to Mahaffey's class and attended a Natural Resource Management Club party at which Mahaffey "had a good harmony with his students."

Boardman also testified that he had never heard Mahaffey swear or use sexist remarks like some students complained he had.

"I'll be honest, until this trip up here I'd never heard Dr. Mahaffey swear, never use a four letter word," he said.

Testifying Tuesday afternoon was John Steffen, head of the Department of Administration and Foundations, who interviewed seven women who had complained about Mahaffey making sexist comments in class. Steffen was asked by Strickler to conduct the interviews and make a report.

Steffen said he believed the women were sincere in expressing their opinions and he "could detect no evidence of this being a lark." The consensus of the women, however, was that Mahaffey was an "enthusiastic, energetic presenter of his material" and was helpful in finding jobs for department graduates.

Of the seven, Kelley Collins, who testified Thursday, was the only one with positive remarks about Mahaffey. Five of the remaining six students complained of sexist remarks, Steffen said, and the last was worried more about unfair grading practices. Steffen said the students believed the sexist remarks occurred in a "consistent pattern."

He told Pravda that NATO's deployment of U.S. missiles in Western Europe had increased both political and military tensions. The Soviets walked out of the Geneva talks on reducing medium-range

Student leadership is significant

The time of year has come to begin listening to the campaigns of those students wishing to serve the student body as president or senators or members of the Board of Student Publications. The campaign period is generally met with mixed reactions. Some feel the elections are not significant because the outcome has little effect on the individual student's life at K-State.

It is true that not all student body presidents and all student senators have had a large effect on the student body. However, it is equally true that some student governments have made sweeping decisions which will affect students for years to come. Examples of such decisions are the construction of a coliseum and the renovation of Holton Hall.

One sure thing about the coming year's student government is that it will spend more than $800,000 of student money. Fiscal policies and actions taken will depend on the type of leadership which fills those offices. Most candidates will seek office with good intentions, but good intentions alone will not ensure proper representation.

Successful candidates must take their new office seriously. The job, if performed properly, will take a significant amount of time, much personal feedback from other students and a creative ability to find solutions when no easy ones appear to be available.

Candidates should have to demonstrate their ability to be a student representative. Lofty goals are not enough in themselves. Candidates should be able to articulate a rational plan of achieving their goals. Unless candidates can demonstrate an understanding of the current system, and how to work within that system, students would do well to vote for someone else.

Significant steps forward for the students at K-State will only come with the best leadership they can find. The student body deserves no less.

Reagan's 1985 budget deficient

Besides the major opposition he faces concerning a nuclear freeze, women's rights, environmental protection and minority rights, Ronald Reagan's bid for re-election will be hindered by his proposed fiscal 1985 budget and its looming deficit.

Reagan's budget includes spending $925.5 billion and a projected $180 billion deficit. The president proposes $5 billion worth of cuts in social and domestic programs with assorted minor tax increases, but a 14 percent increase in military spending.

Reagan does not propose any major action to begin shoring up the deficit. Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., Senate Finance Committee chairman, said "The deficit reduction in (Reagan's) package could be put in a matchbook — a very small matchbook." In fact, under Reagan's plan the deficit will not decrease until fiscal year 1988.

Last year, in light of an overwhelming deficit and against the advice of his economists to address the problem, Reagan's budget assumed a below-average growth for the economy and proposed minimal tax increases. Subsequently, the economy showed a recovery, with unemployment dropping and retail sales rising.

But Reagan's economic policies lack a solid enough foundation to guarantee long-term recovery for the American economy. The immediate recovery, weak in itself, cannot last with such a deficit, because such debt keeps interest rates at inflated levels. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Paul Volcker has said he will not increase the money supply to counter high interest rates. Unless the deficit is checked, and drastically, the American economy will not experience a lasting recovery and could slide again into recession.

Reagan assumes the present recovery will continue, depending on the economic surge to ease the deficit, and allow him to postpone 'cut-now-or-pay-later' budget decisions. But if he is not re-elected, he may not deal with the deficit again. And chances are, with his new proposals, he won't return to the White House in January. Reagan plans reductions in Medicaid, Aid to Families with Dependent Children and education and other domestic programs. These cuts, coupled with the proposed increase in military spending, may seriously undermine his re-election chances.

The lower and middle classes will suffer most from his proposed spending reductions. What support Reagan has there could quickly fall off, especially considering the increase in military spending.

This is where the budget must be cut. Defense buildup as it now exists is excessive. Reagan should not sacrifice critical domestic programs such as aid to the poor and education in favor of building more nuclear arms. Of course the standing military must be financed, but Reagan's proposed increases for law enforcement, foreign aid and the Coast Guard, along with arms buildup, should be reconsidered.

Ultimately Congress has the final say in determining budget funding. The Legislature should heed expert advice that warns of increased economic problems if the deficit is not controlled. And constituents should object to such ill-planned economics. Reagan is ignoring the country's best interests.

RONALD REAGAN MUST REALLY LOVE THE POOR...

... HE MADE SO MANY OF THEM.

This could be 'Ceresous' business

There's one thing I like about the Kansas Legislature: you never can tell when to take it seriously.

My column on Monday addressed "The Great Rest Area Debate," one of the "serious" issues facing the Legislature this year. I have found another burning issue in the hearts and minds of our lawmakers. The Legislature is debating whether a statue should be placed atop the Capitol.

Never mind that such important issues as education, tax reforms and budgets are left sitting on the back burner. Let's ignore the condition of the state's highways for a while longer. Kansas' lawmakers are too busy trying to solve the big problem — what to do with the lightbulb which marks the way to the capital of Oz...er, the Land of Ahs.

The statue in question represents Ceres, the Roman goddess of agriculture. The Romans modeled Ceres after Demeter, the Greek goddess of agriculture and fertility. The statue was originally selected for the dome by a committee in 1889 from a model made by J.H. Mahoney, an Indiana sculptor. The project was abandoned in 1901 when it was determined the project's price, a whopping $6,950, could be better spent on other programs.

The House Ways and Means Committee heard a proposal on Thursday to place Ceres on top of the statehouse. As expected, the lawmakers found ways to tie up a seemingly harmless piece of legislation which would turn out the "dome light" forever.

"Kansas is considered the 'Bread Basket of the World,' but it is also part of the 'Bible Belt' of this nation," Rep. Pat Weaver, D-Baxter Springs, said. "Thousands of people in this state give thanks to God for our rich bounty of grain — and they don't want some bronze statue of a pagan goddess elevated to represent that bounty."

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

Rep. John Solbach, D-Lawrence, said the statue was an appropriate choice.

"The form of government we have is specifically rooted in ancient Greece," Solbach said. "Those who commissioned the drafting (in the 1800s) had a sense of Western civilization, a sense of history. It was in that spirit Ceres was proposed to begin with. I don't think it's good to forget our past."

An amendment was proposed to name the statue the "Spirit of Kansas," but to no avail. Weaver said the name change was just placing "an old product in a new wrapper." Solbach said Ceres is the appropriate name for the statue.

The proposal was tabled after Rep. David Heinemann, R-Garden City, offered a proposal to hold a statewide search for the proper "Spirit of Kansas" to place atop the dome.

"If we do nothing today we will be back next year and the next year," he said. "Maybe a century from now we'll still be wondering if that 1,000-watt lightbulb ought to be sitting up there."

"At least if we do something," Heinemann said, "we won't be back next year."

Amen. I think they ought to put the statue atop the Capitol. Call it Ceres, or Spirit of Kansas, or Josephine, if you so desire. Just get that unshaded lightbulb off the dome.

Isn't it interesting the U.S. Capitol's dome is topped with a statue named the Statue of Freedom? I've seen pictures of the statue. It looks as if it could be named Mars, the Roman god of war. Does anybody object to that statue?

If the committee does decide to search for a more appropriate symbol of Kansas, I've got two ideas. A giant statue, featuring a tornado, Dorothy, Toto and the gang from the "Wizard of Oz," could grace the top of the statehouse. Topeka's do seem a little wary about anything which remotely looks like a twister, but I'm sure the whole state can be proud of naming the tornado the state's official symbol.

My second idea is to place a statue of a Kansas rest stop atop the dome. A neon "Closed" sign, placed across the statue, would add the appropriate touch and would be symbolic of the activity which often takes place beneath it.

It would be more interesting than a 1,000-watt lightbulb.

VCR owners benefit from ruling

WASHINGTON — Last Tuesday's Supreme Court decision allowing home recording of television programs prompted us to think of our friend Ron.

Since connecting a video cassette recorder to his television last year, Ron, 26, has regularly invited guests to his home to view feature movies and films of rock concerts, all rented from an establishment nearby.

Yet, by his own admission, he has used his VCR rarely, if at all, to record television programs. "Who'd want to own that stuff?" he asked incredulously.

That question, of course, mattered little in the high court's long-awaited ruling. If anyone copies a program simply to "shift" the time of his own viewing, he's acting within the law, the justices said. Congress, they added, must deal with the other possible situations.

But Ron speaks for many home-video nuts, who, at least for now, are a fairly affluent bunch. They've forfeited several hundreds of dollars principally to escape the garbage for which television programmers are famous. While they might use the machine to record a news broadcast, soap opera or major movie, they find little else worth the price of a blank cassette.

This isn't to suggest that the much-concerned "creative community" of artists, directors and producers doesn't deserve some share in the increasingly popular video rental market.

But implicit in the VCR's future success will be a much wider public dissatisfaction with the quality of what Hollywood produces for television. For years, producers and advertisers have been able to forego the higher end of the consumer market for a less demanding side. As video technology becomes more affordable — industry groups foresee VCRs in 38 percent (up from less than 10 percent today) of American households within four years — the television networks may be forced to deliver an improved product, or else.

During the next two years, the Justice Department plans to double the number of attorneys assigned to environmental law enforcement, said Mary Walker, deputy assistant attorney general in Justice's Land and Natural Resources Division. Yet the question remains whether there'll be an increased workload to match. The Environmental Protection Agency referred only 45 civil cases to Justice for prosecution during the last quarter of 1983.

Despite the increased number of older adults returning to school, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said the demand for college and university faculty members will decline 15 percent by 1995. College teaching ranks ninth in the Bureau's list of America's 20 most quickly contracting occupations.

Democratic presidential candidates cost taxpayers more than Republican contestants, if the first disbursement of federal matching funds is any indication. Six Democrats received nearly $9 million in federal matching funds; three qualified for more than $1 million.

At this point in 1980, only Jimmy Carter had qualified for at least $1 million. Four major Republican candidates at that time — Howard Baker, George Bush, Bob Dole and Ronald Reagan — had qualified for little more than $2 million combined.

Library deserves association membership

Editor,
It's time we start making long-range goals and taking the necessary measures to improve our libraries, so that they can qualify for membership in the Association of Research Libraries.

The ARL is comprised of the 104 largest academic libraries in the United States and Canada. Currently, K-State libraries are about 25 index points below the lowest of the 104 members, Oklahoma State University, and one point below the minimum standard for membership. What must our university do to qualify? We must improve on our primary statistical deficiencies. These are amount of total volumes, volumes added yearly, current serial subscription, binding expenditures, total salaries and number of staff.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, stated that "Kansas State University must meet the minimum index standard for four consecutive years before membership is even offered by the Association of Research Libraries."

Membership in the ARL will assure K-State faculty and students that their programs are adequately supported by library resources, moving us closer to academic excellence. Make a difference, take a stand and support our libraries. Student voices can go a long way. Let's start working on the future now. Let's keep on booking!

Student earns thanks for helping motorists

Editor,
My family and I wish to take this means to thank an unnamed "angel of mercy," who happens to be a K-State student.

On the night of Dec. 22, our family car stalled on Interstate 70 about three miles west of Goodland, during that record-breaking sub-zero weather when the wind and snow quite literally made it a deathly night to be out. Mindful of others who had already perished in such an experience, I was especially concerned for our two small children who were taking the ordeal in better spirits than I. The traffic seemed particularly heavy for such a night. All of Colorado seemed to be fleeing east and we wanted only to go to our home a few miles to the west. Finally, when no one else was responding to our distress signal, an especially nice young man traveling alone stopped when my wife flagged him down. He was a K-State student on his way home to Ft. Collins and quite willingly went out of his way to deliver us safely to our home, not accepting anything in return.

As often happens in such a situation, we didn't think to get his name and address. So we just want to thank him again; he knows who he is. Next time he's this way, we would like for him to stop by. And we thought it would be good for others to know there are indeed some good-hearted souls at K-State.

Lafene tackles allergies, immunizations

By TERESA CAWTHON
Collegian Reporter

Sneezing and a runny nose may not always be signs of the common cold.

"These symptoms may be indicative of allergies," said Janet Carl, registered nurse at Lafene Student Health Center allergy clinic.

Carl administers an average of 6,000 allergy shots during a fiscal year, in addition to other duties.

Carl, who has worked in the allergy clinic for about a year and in student health for approximately five years, screens students to determine if allergy testing is necessary.

Working closely with Dr. Daniel Martin, associate professor of student health with specialties in allergies and immunology, Carl discusses symptoms, the seasons when the symptoms occur, the duration of the symptoms and what the student thinks he may be allergic to. After evaluation, if Carl and Martin believe the student may be allergic to substances other than foods, they schedule testing.

The testing takes about an hour and a half. The student must refrain from taking prescription medications, over-the-counter antihistamines or decongestants for at least 72 hours before the testing.

Martin and Carl test the student for 50 allergens common to this area including grasses, molds, trees, dust and animals.

The student is tested on the back. Carl uses a cotton swab with the cotton removed to break the top layer of skin. Then one drop of the individual allergen is placed on the break. After all 50 tests are done, the student waits about 30 minutes for a reaction.

"During this testing, no needles are used," Carl said.

Martin and Carl then "read" the test results to see which substances the student reacted to and how he reacted.

"The student may react to a substance which is not especially common to this area; however, if the substance is common to the area he is from or where he will be going after graduation, we may schedule him to receive the (allergy) shots," Carl said.

If Martin and Carl determine the student should receive allergy shots, the allergen extract is ordered. If it is a single allergen, it takes about three weeks for it to arrive at Lafene. If it is a mixture of allergens, it may take up to six weeks to arrive.

"Once a student's allergen arrives, the student will receive anywhere from one to two shots a week as a rule. We usually start the student on a diluted allergen and then increase the amount of the dosage and the strength of the allergen," Carl said.

The gradual build-up is necessary to help the student increase his resistance and to avoid a local reaction. Most allergy patients do not react. Some may experience reactions that are no more than a pink or red discoloration where the injection was given. Others may experience a more severe reaction such as a thoracic reaction, where the throat closes and the patient cannot breathe.

"This possibility of reacting is the reason we insist that all allergy patients wait at Lafene at least 20 minutes after their shots. Increased physical activity or stress levels too soon after the shot can trigger a local reaction that one normally would not experience," Carl said.

"A cold is not an allergy and an allergy is not a cold," Carl said. "A runny nose, hay fever, sinus, ear problems, asthma and sneezing are all indicators that an individual may be suffering from allergies. If these symptoms occur only during certain seasons or over a long period of time, it may be reason to seek an allergy consultant."

Immunization interviews and injections are also part of Carl's responsibilities.

"The college student is supposed to be an adult, and taking responsibility for his health is part of the metamorphosis of the student. Women should insure they are protected before they start their families. They owe that to themselves and their families," Carl said.

"Each student should insure that he keeps his immunizations current. If he had the measles-mumps-rubella vaccine before he was 15 months old, or if he is going to escort a group or younger students on a tour, for example, he should have that vaccine updated," Carl said.

Carl said she is also seeing 25 students who were exposed to — but did not contract — tuberculosis. They take daily oral medications for one year. Carl sees them once a month to check for any symptoms and to counsel them. This treatment will insure their immunity so that they can never develop TB.

"This treatment and the medication is provided to the student at no charge by the state," Carl said.

Students who are planning foreign travel might require immunizations before their departure. Immunization counseling is available through Carl at Lafene.

"What shots you need depends on what country or countries you go to. Surprisingly, even the order in which you visit countries can make a difference. If you travel to Africa, for example, traveling from the interior of the continent to the exterior, you will need more immunizations than you will if you travel from the exterior to the interior," Carl said. "Not having the proper immunizations can result in being quarantined somewhere along your route."

"If the student will come in to see me at least three months in advance of the planned trip, we can schedule the immunizations so the student may not be sick on the day of a test. Certain immunizations cannot be given at the same time. Others must be given in a series so many days, weeks or months apart," Carl said.

Topekan to enter Republican race

TOPEKA — James Van Slyke, who was fired from the campaign staff of former Rep. Jim Jeffries in 1980, says he has started collecting signatures on petitions to get his name on the Republican primary ballot for Jeffries' old seat.

Van Slyke, 26, of Topeka, is one of several potential GOP candidates to oppose the re-election of Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan.

Van Slyke said in a statement Monday that his campaign would be tied closely to the record of President Reagan, and he criticized Slattery for opposing many of Reagan's programs.

Van Slyke was a 22-year-old history graduate from Yale in 1980 when he was dismissed from Jeffries' campaign staff in the 2nd District. He was fired after allegedly misrepresenting himself as a graduate student to obtain semi-private documents relating to Sam Keys, a former Kansas State University dean who was the Democratic congressional nominee in 1980.

Other Jackson wins radio award

LOS ANGELES — Poor Michael Jackson. He's just ended the single most successful year of his career and nobody knows about it. No, not Michael Joe Jackson, 25, the singer who's up for 12 Grammys and just won eight American Music Awards. Everyone knows about him.

But not Michael Robin Jackson, the syndicated radio talk show host with the British accent.

It's "funny in a way," said the radio Jackson. "I got a Golden Mike for the first time in 21 years. I just found out my show's No. 1 in its time slot in New York. And nobody knows!"

The KABC talk show host said he's been confused with the former Jackson Five lead singer for some time now. He said he was introduced to singer Jackson once.

"He looked up at me and said, 'Where'd you get that name?' I told him, 'I had it before you.'"

Radio announcer hosts 'Extras' tour

LOS ANGELES — Now that Beverly Hills has banned "Homes of the Stars" tour buses from its residential streets, radio announcer Gary Owens figures there might be some interest in an alternative sightseeing trip.

So as a promotion for radio station KPRZ, the former "Laugh-In" regular says he will take 40 of his listeners on his "Homes of the Extras" tour.

Highlights will include visits to the homes of a lady who was hired to clap all day for a Bing Crosby film, a man who carried a rock in "The Robe" and extras who milled in bus station scenes and cheered as Frankenstein's monster was destroyed in his castle.

'Mike Hammer' to debut on CBS

LOS ANGELES — Mickey Spillane has a theory about why Mike Hammer, his archetypical hard-boiled private eye, was unwelcome on television until recently.

It was because "(Jimmy) Carter was president," said Spillane, who looks as though he might have served as a model for his creation. "He was soft."

Spillane and producer Jay Bernstein tried to sell Hammer's story to the networks in the 1970s, but there were no takers. But "Mike Hammer," with Stacy Keach in the title role, makes its debut Saturday on CBS. An introductory movie will be telecast Thursday.

Organizations to aid voter registration

By SUZY HILL
Collegian Reporter

Two campus organizations, College Republicans and the Associated Students of Kansas, are planning to help students register to vote during the 1984 primary and general presidential elections.

All Kansas voters are required to register, and local eligibility rules vary. This could prevent some students from voting.

"The K-State chapter of College Republicans has a tentative plan for voter registration," said Glenda Humbert, senior in journalism and mass communications and state secretary for the College Republicans. "We would like to set up a voter registration table in the Union to make it more convenient for students to register."

"By being deputized, we are an impartial group, committed to registering all parties," she said.

ASK is organizing a task force which will concentrate its efforts on voter registration. ASK also is working at the local, state and national level to invite candidates or supporters of national candidates to visit the campus and answer questions students may have.

"The majority of the students at K-State vote absentee. Veterinary and architecture students are sometimes an exception since they often live in Manhattan year-round," Humbert said.

"Voting registration has to be made as simple as possible to get students involved," said Sonia Overholser, senior in modern languages and head of the ASK task force.

Students who are not permanent residents of Riley County may apply for an absentee ballot either by filing an affidavit with their county election officer or have an elector living in the same county file an affidavit in their behalf.

Affidavits for the primary election, which is the first Tuesday in August, must be filed between April 1 and the last business day of the week preceding the primary election.

For the general election, which occurs on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, affidavits must be filed between 90 days before the election and the last business day of the week before the election.

An affirmation must accompany the application for an absentee ballot form. This affirms that the voter is a qualified elector of a specified precinct and county. The signature of the voter is required.

The absentee ballots contain each candidate's name and city of residence. The ballot envelope contains a form declaring that the elector marked the ballot in secrecy and sealed the envelope himself. The ballot envelope also must state the former residence of the voter and the date the voter moved to his present residence.

Any U.S. citizen who is at least 18 years of age and a resident of Kansas may contact his county election office in person, by letter or telephone to request an application. If applying for a ballot by mail, you should do so at least three weeks before the registration deadline.

A voter must re-register if he changes his name or place of residence. A change of residence includes moving from one unit to another in the same apartment building.

Woman's divorce award sets state precedent

By The Associated Press

A Wamego woman's $51,000 award in Riley County District Court marks the first time in Kansas that a woman has recovered damages for alleged beatings by her husband, lawyers in the case said.

The award came after a three-year court battle and a landmark decision by the Kansas State Supreme Court involving the divorce of Virginia Ann Ebert and Patrick Ebert of Wamego.

In the suit, decided Monday in Riley County District Court by a 12-member jury, Mrs. Ebert had asked for $195,000 in damages, and Patrick Ebert had asked for $30,000 in counterclaims. Each contended that the other had inflicted physical injuries.

"Ann Ebert's courage in taking this case to the jury may have far-reaching implications in the area of battered spouses," her attorney Donn Everett said. "If a spouse is battering the other spouse, they will now be aware that he or she will have to respond in court in damages."

Testimony in the case took three days. The seven-man, five-woman jury returned its verdict Monday after one day of deliberation.

Patrick Ebert, a Wamego farmer, was not awarded any money by the jury.

In 1981, Mrs. Ebert's suit asking for damages was dismissed in Riley County District Court, based on previous case law, according to court documents.

Couples face challenges of separation

By BECKY WILEY
Collegian Reporter

Long distance. In this case, it's not the next best thing to being there, but two K-State women are making their long distance marriages work as positive investments for the future.

Anita Buttell, graduate in dietetics and institutional management, will be separated from her husband, who attends Emporia State University, until the summer of 1985.

Pat Graff, also a graduate in dietetics and institutional management, is apart from her husband and two sons, who live in Beatrice, Nebraska. She said she keeps the communication line open via telephone.

"Being best friends is the only way to do something like this. When you walk into each other's lives only on weekends, you're not going to know where that person is coming from like before," Buttell said. "You probably won't know why that person is really happy or upset about something. You have to stop, be a friend and take the time to find out."

"I stress the importance of a good communications system," said Marian Spears, head of the department of dietetic, restaurant and institutional management. "It makes it difficult when the husband doesn't understand it all. When he understands his wife's situation, he'll become more interested," she said.

Spears said she realizes how difficult the situation can be, so she listens and is always available for the students to talk to.

She said the women set themselves time limits for completing their studies, so she arranged schedules for them and tries to help them meet their goals.

"I'm concerned that the faculty needs to have empathy for the students and give them lots of support," Spears said. "I can't make any decisions, but I do try to direct them."

She said she also encourages the women to get together often and be a support for one another.

"We formed our own support network because there's so many of us going through the same thing. When we get really down, we just think of someone else in a more difficult situation and realize we're not so bad off. We pick each other up," Graff said.

Both women said they have received negative comments from people who believe that a woman can't be a wife and have a career at the same time, especially when it means leaving your home to attend graduate school.

"You have to tune those people out. You have to step out on faith and say 'This is what I'm going to do,'" Buttell said.

Buttell said she chose to come to school here because, "I saw a way to be a career woman, and be a mother and do my kids justice, when I have kids."

She explained that with a master's degree in dietetics and institutional management, she could be flexible in a career choice because graduates in her field are in demand.

Graff said she saw coming to K-State as a way to expand her job opportunities.

"I was real frustrated because I was doing a registered dietician's job, but not getting the pay I should because I wasn't registered," she said.

Rick Efros, a full-time intern at the Counseling Center in Holton Hall, stressed the importance of having a strong relationship before experiencing such a separation.

"Their chances of getting through the situation will be much better than if the relationship is shaky to start with," he said.

"It's also important that the couple communicate about the situation," Efros said. "If the couple is having problems with jealousy, loneliness or keeping active, they should deal with those issues."

Film portrays occult in new way

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

In Peter Weir's most recent films, he has shown a very adroit ability in conveying atmospheric settings. "The Year of Living Dangerously" was permeated with a bristling energy that rushed the film's primitive race. The world of the Aborigines is presented with reverence instead of exploitation.

In the film's first few minutes, it seems to be little different from any of the supernatural films of the past. But "The Last Wave" quickly becomes much more once Burton's quest to discover the secret behind the tribe's powers turns into a quest to discover the force inside himself which pushes him on and motivates his dreams.

The film is full of images and scenes that are similar to ones seen before in films of the occult, but Weir has supplied a new perspective that makes the material seem completely fresh again. Although the film definitely does have its share of frightening moments, such as when Burton grabs a flashlight, ventures into the sewers below the city, and searches for the Aborigines' sacred ground, Weir's motives aren't solely to frighten the audience. Instead, he is always concerned with the effect that the initiation has upon Burton.

Richard Chamberlain's performance as Burton is so deadpan that if Weir had not given the film such a hypnotic atmosphere, the character would have appeared completely uninteresting. Chamberlain shows very little below the character's surface, simply conveying a two-dimensional representation of the white collar worker.

While it is true that Burton is very much in a daze once his dreams begin, Chamberlain plays the character as if he was a zombie instead of trying to give him any life.

ing force, creeping down the stairs as if it were in search of something.

The phenomenal power that seems to control the weather comes from a group of Aborigines who live within the city limits. When one of the tribe members is murdered by the others in the group, a lawyer is brought in to defend them in court. As the lawyer David Burton, portrayed by Richard Chamberlain, is drawn into the world of the Aborigines, he makes discoveries about himself that question the style of life he has led. He has vivid dreams that foretell the future — dreams which should only belong to members of the Aborigine tribal clan. Burton knows far more than any white man should ever be allowed to know. "The Last Wave" then depicts Burton's right of passage into this tribal clan.

Weir presents the material with a conviction that keeps the plot from becoming contrived. The strength of the rain makes the occult forces Burton meets seem very real and not just the mumblings of a characters through a powder keglike environment. "Picnic At Hanging Rock" was steeped in an eerie aura of the occult. In "The Last Wave" Weir has created an atmosphere that is charged with an ominous foreboding that suggests an apocalyptic destruction.

In the film, water seems to be guided by a supernatural power. It drenches all of the action in the film. The streets of Sydney, Australia, are continuously soaked with a torrential downpour that strews tree branches across the pavement.

From the first moments in the film, water is shown as an oppressive force. Children playing at school begin hearing thunder when there is no cloud in the sky. Rain then slices down with a ferocity that drenches anyone exposed to it for more than a few seconds. The thunder reaches a crescendo, cracking again and again without a break. The rain turns to baseball-sized hail that smashes the school windows and coats the ground. Water seeping down a stairway appears to be a liv-

Driver to face DUI charges on Tuesday

An 18-year-old Manhattan man is scheduled for arraignment Tuesday in Manhattan Municipal Court on three charges in connection with an incident late Thursday in which he allegedly drove his truck through a garage wall at 701 Canfield Drive.

Stacey M. Launchbaugh, 2208 Green Ave., was arrested early Friday on charges of driving under the influence of alcohol, unreasonable speed and driving left of center. The charges came after he allegedly drove through the south wall of a garage owned by David Adams, associate professor of journalism and mass communications and director of Student Publications, and Patricia Adams, administrative assistant in the Department of Biology.

Launchbaugh had apparently been traveling east on Anderson Avenue when his pickup truck left the roadway, went through the Adams' yard and struck the garage twice, the second time plunging through the wall backwards.

QUIZ

LEFT: A finger inches its way towards the button which will signal a student's desire to answer a quiz-bowl question. ABOVE: Curtis Kastner, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, poses a question to two panels of students during the oral examination segment of the Quadrathlon Tuesday night.

Quadrathlon tests practical skills

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

Knowledge and lab skills were tested this week by the animal science quadrathlon, without the atmosphere of the classroom.

"The quadrathlon is a learning experience, and a lot of fun," Chris Hall, junior in pre-veterinary medicine and quadrathlon contestant, said.

The academic quadrathlon is a four-event contest sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and the American Society of Animal Scientists.

Ten teams of four members each are vying to win the contest. The winning team will compete in the Midwestern contest March 25 in Madison, Wis., and March 26-28 in Chicago.

"I'm delighted we have a vehicle that promotes the 80 percent-reason young people should come to K-State — for academic reasons," Earl Farmer, professor of animal sciences and quadrathlon chairman, said.

"I have a high admiration for people who come out and compete," he said. "We don't put a lid on students' abilities so we can get clear-cut winners."

"The questions aren't ridiculously hard, and they're fair," Hall said.

The four contest areas of the quadrathlon are a laboratory practical, a public presentation, a written exam and a quiz bowl.

The laboratory practical was conducted Monday night in Weber Hall.

The practical involved six areas: equine, dairy, sheep, monogastric, meats and physiology.

The equine portion included drawing blood from horses and identifying shoe size and equipment.

In the dairy foods and milk quality part of the contest, students identified and gave functions of devices used in the dairy industry. They also answered questions about dairy cattle production and identified five cheeses.

In the area of sheep, one student from each team had three minutes to trim a sheep hoof. Also, feed rations were identified, questions about nutrients were answered, and a fecal bag was placed on a lamb.

The identification of nine feed stuffs was one purpose of the monogastric section. Students also named swine production equipment and answered practical questions on swine development and diets.

The meats area included questions and problems on carcass evaluation and bone and muscle identification.

The final area of the lab practical was physiology. For this, students identified 25 parts of the female and male reproductive tracts. They also identified commercially produced hormones and gave uses for the hormones.

The public presentations, written examinations and the first round of the quiz bowl were Tuesday night in Weber and Call Halls.

For the public presentation, each team was assigned a topic concerning the animal industry.

Each team had 90 minutes to prepare its 15-minute presentation.

Research materials were provided. One team member from each team gave the presentation.

Teams had one hour to complete the written exam. Team members were allowed to work together to answer questions and problems about the animal industry.

In the first round of the quiz bowl, two teams competed against each other.

A toss-up question began the oral contest. Students had five seconds to answer the question without team conference by triggering an electronic buzzer system.

Every fifth question was a bonus question, with 10 seconds and team conferences allowed.

If a team was incorrect, 10 points were subtracted from their score. The other team was then given the opportunity to answer. If correct, the team received 10 points.

"There's no way to study for the contest," Calvin Binns, senior in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "A lot of it is what you know from experience."

The final round of the quiz bowl is scheduled for Thursday night.

Scores from the four areas will be tabulated after Thursday's contest. The top two teams will compete in a quiz bowl play-off at the next Block and Bridle meeting at 8 p.m., Feb. 7 in Williams Auditorium in Umler Hall.

Each member of the top two teams will receive a trophy.

Winning team members will receive $150 to help defray travel expenses.

The winning team will travel March 25 to the University of Wisconsin in Madison for the Midwest laboratory practical contest.

From there, the team is to go to the Americana Hotel in Chicago for the other three contest areas.

The team will compete against teams representing eight other states: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Missouri, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin.

Guy Kiracofe, professor of animal sciences, also will travel to Chicago as faculty representative for the state. He is in charge of the written exam at the Midwest meeting.

This is the third year K-State will compete in the quadrathlon.

After answering a question wrong during Tuesday night's quiz bowl at Weber Hall, Tracy King, senior in animal sciences and industry, covers her mouth in embarrassment as her teammate Anita Conley, senior in animal sciences and industry, grins. Teams competed in four areas: laboratory practical, public presentation, written exam and the quiz bowl.

Lower participation expected in '84 wheat PIK

By SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Less local participation is expected in the 1984 Payment-In-Kind program, said Mike Robinson, executive director of the Riley County Agriculture Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS).

"We have had 40 to 50 percent of the local farmers sign up so far, about 200, but I don't anticipate the participation of the 1983 program — there isn't as much to offer the farmer in the 1984 program," Robinson said.

The sign up for the 1984 program began Jan. 16 and will continue through Feb. 24, he said.

The program, an acreage reduction program for feed grain and wheat, began in 1983 under the Payment-In-Kind name, but the concept began before last year.

"The PIK program didn't originate last year. The name is new, but the concept began in the '50s," John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture, said.

"In 1950 the program was called the Soil Bond Program, and in 1960 it was called the Set Aside Program. In 1970 there was a severe drought which reduced the world food production, and then the PIK program began again in the 1980s," he said.

"In reality, the PIK Program is a payment program to farmers for cutting back on their acreage and crops with payments large enough to farmers to encourage a reduction. And farmers were successful in reducing crop acreage by a round figure of 80 million acres, reducing the surplus while improving farm incomes in 1983," Dunbar said.

The producer, according to the contract for the 1984 PIK program, is defined as the owner, landlord, tenant, sharecropper, operator and any other individual involved in the crop production. The producer is a key element in the PIK program.

Two components of the PIK program are paid diversion and acreage reduction.

"Paid diversion means the producer is paid income not to plant on his land. Acreage reduction is when the producer is asked, in order to be in the program, to reduce his acres by a certain percentage, but doesn't get any payment to do so," Orlen Grunewald, assistant professor of economics, said.

"The PIK program involves producers going into the program and receiving 90 percent of their base yield not to plant on those acres. This base yield is calculated by looking at the history of farms in the area and their classifications (each one is classified), while taking into account the weather and what a normal average yield is for each farm. Farmers are supposed to get 90 percent of what their average yield would be in PIK," he said.

"For wheat there was a 10 to 30 percent PIK, a 5 percent paid diversion and a 15 percent acreage reduction in the 1983 program," Grunewald said.

"Feed grain had a 10 percent paid diversion, 10 percent acreage reduction and a 10 to 30 percent PIK. The farmers could choose increments of 5 percent, anywhere between 10 and 30 percent, for what they would reduce (in acreage)," he said.

PIK grain is stored in specific elevators around the country or on individuals' farms. The producer then receives the payment-in-kind, a receipt in the mail and payment for the first five months of the marketing year at a storage rate of 2.5 cents, Grunewald said.

"This was done so that all the grain wouldn't belong to the market immediately, in which case farmers would probably sell the PIK grain, and in turn reduce the price," he said.

In the 1970s, an increase of grain exports on an annual, sizable basis began. In the 1980s, the dollar value became stronger, increasing the price of U.S. exports abroad, while reducing the nation's export level. The recession also helped reduce consumption of U.S. grains abroad. The United States started to reduce exports at the same time, and the situation of record crops occurred, Grunewald said.

"In 1981-1982, we had record crops and were building up substantial supplies of grain in what is called a farmer owned reserve. This reserve is owned by the government. They give farmers a loan for their grain to keep their grain held in reserve, heading off the market to support the price," Grunewald said.

"In turn, the large amounts of grain being stored were depressing prices down around the low levels and holding them there, costing the government large amounts of money," he said.

Because of the cost of grain storage, Grunewald said, the administration decided on the PIK program.

"Grain was building up and not doing any good, while farm prices were hovering at low levels. There had to be some way to induce farmers to produce their product, and yet not cost the treasury any more money," Grunewald said.

PIK money is "basically old money," he said.

"The farmers were paid loans several years ago to put money in reserve, so that was in the past budget, not the present. It's basically old money. While not affecting the current budget, PIK gave farmers an endorsement in that the grain was worth plenty on the market," Grunewald said.

Like many other government programs, PIK was announced after the wheat farmer had planted his crop.

"When PIK came out, the wheat was already planted. Nevertheless, about an 80 percent participation rate in feed grains, and a slightly smaller rate was reported in wheat," Grunewald said.

"I don't think the government purposefully has brought out programs after crops have been planted. It's just poor planning on the part of the 35-year-old mystery remains unsolved

Students fail to identify 'Poe Toaster'

By The College Press Service

"I've got a feeling he won't be here this year," fretted Chris Sharpf, graduate student at the University of Baltimore.

Sharpf was one of a handful of students who braved a terrible snowstorm and subzero temperatures in a cemetery through the night of Jan. 18 and 19 to crack a 35-year-old mystery at the University of Maryland at Baltimore, the mystery of the Poe Toaster.

Edgar Allan Poe is buried at the cemetery, squeezed between UMAB's law library and the university hospital. Since at least 1949 — there is anecdotal evidence it began before then — someone has snuck in to the cemetery on Jan. 19, the writer's birthday, and left a half-empty bottle of very expensive cognac and three long-stemmed roses on the grave.

A few Poe lovers from area campuses have been trying to spot the Poe Toaster, who wants to be nameless for evermore. Last year, five of them sat up all night in the catacombs beneath Westminster Church in hopes of catching a glimpse of the ephemeral toaster. And for the first time, they succeeded.

At about 1:30 a.m. they saw a tall, slender man dashing through the cemetery.

Afterwards Jeff Jerome, curator of the Poe house and museum, found the cognac and roses at the grave.

With the news came increased interest. Last week, about 250 people made it through the storm to attend a formal tribute at the church, now a university meeting hall. There they watched a dramatization of "The Telltale Heart" and heard a reading of "Annabelle Lee."

Baltimore Mayor William Schaefer even got into the act, naming Jan. 18 and 19 Poe Appreciation Days.

The gathering interest, however, worried some Poe lovers.

"We certainly welcome an interest in Poe," said UMAB spokesman Ruth Walsh. "But I hate to see anybody spoil this thing by scaring the Poe Toaster off," she said.

At midnight, the celebrants sang "Happy Birthday," and lifted glasses of ginger ale, champagne and amatillado in tribute to the writer.

Then the crowd dispersed, leaving the handful of pessimistic students to repair to a courtyard adjacent to the cemetery for the night-long vigil. Still, the Poe Toaster didn't appear.

At about 5:30 a.m., Sharpf said, he couldn't take it any longer. He took momentary refuge in the church to warm himself. Once there, he saw a man pull up to the front gate of the cemetery in a large sedan, get out, and walk to Poe's grave.

"He came and went just like that," Sharpf recalled, snapping his fingers. "Very quick. I didn't recognize that it was the Poe Toaster until I went to the grave, and found the cognac and roses."

current administration," he said.

The 1983 PIK program was an economical benefit, said Frank Mosier, state executive director of the ASCS.

"The farmer got to use his own market to come up with his own value — it was an economical benefit. There were 50 million bushels of wheat, 34 million bushels of corn and 25 million bushels of grain distributed," Mosier said.

"The 1983 program had a positive outcome in regards to feed grains and in regards to supply and demand," he said.

Dunbar agreed that the program is sound.

"The PIK Program is basically a sound program if you want to bring production into adjustment with demand," he said.

The local farmers consider the program to be an asset, although the drought played a crucial role in the outcome of the 1983 program, Dunbar said.

"In general, the local farmers who participated, benefitted — especially the corn farmers. The wheat farmers didn't benefit as much," he said.

"My understanding is that farmers who put corn acreage into PIK received more from the program than they would have received because of the greatly reduced yields due to the drought. It turned out to be an insurance program as well," Dunbar said.

Dwight Johnson, a local farmer, bid 100 percent on two of his three farms in the 1983 program.

"I was definitely pleased. The drought accelerated the effects of the program, because of the decline in production. It worked out well, but I'm not sure about the 1984 program. I am still looking into it," he said.

Other farmers also are considering the 1984 program with more caution.

"With the way the year (1983) went — with the weather — it (the PIK program) was a good deal financially. I was real satisfied. The program was a big help. I believe that a lot of other farmers were happy with the program. There was a lot of participation. But I leave a lot of the success of the 1983 program with the weather, the drought," David Cederberg, a Manhattan farmer, said.

"But next year, I'm not going to participate. There are drawbacks in the 1984 program — less money for leaving fields idle while more land has to be left out," Cederberg said.

There is no real change in the 1984 PIK program, but it is not quite as attractive as last year's program, Mosier said.

The 1984 program is still an optional program. Sign up for participation in the program is taking place this month, but unlike last year, the 1984 PIK program will only involve wheat reduction, Mosier said.

"The farmers can participate with 10 to a maximum of 20 percent (reduction) of their base acreage and receive 75 percent back," he said.

"The 1984-1985 program doesn't look as appealing for wheat producers because it lacks the benefits and incentives of the 1983 program," Mike Christian, Riley county extension agriculture agent, said.

"The 1983 program held mixed emotions for the farmers, but most of them did benefit, although regulations continually changed throughout the year," Christian said.

"Riley County has 34,000 acres of wheat, 26,000 acres of grain sorghum and 6,000 acres of corn which could be involved in PIK. Approximately 33 percent of this acreage was involved in the program in 1983, but I only anticipate 15 to 20 percent to be involved in the 1984 program," he said.

Last year's wheat harvest was a record crop, Grunewald said.

"We had a 40 bushel per acre average, which was a record. And we ended up not reducing wheat production much from the year before because of the excellent weather and better varieties of wheat. We have also been at a higher rate of production than we have been in the past. Also, the farmers who got involved took out their worst land," he said.

Uphill battle awaits U.S. hockey team

By The Associated Press

Do you believe in miracles? You'd better if you're hoping for another gold medal from the U.S. hockey team at the Olympics.

"The Olympic hockey fan, the one who tunes in (only) every four years to watch the U.S. team, is expecting us to win it again," said Team USA coach Lou Vairo. "But two weeks after the Olympics, they'll forget about it until 1988."

"The knowledgeable fans understand the odds against us. We're going over there as the defending champions, and they're loading up for us. But we're also going over there as heavy underdogs."

Vairo coaches the youngest U.S.

team ever, with an average age of 20.5. The team is built on speed, defensive mobility, conditioning and enthusiasm, but is short on experience, returning only captain Phil Verchota and John Harrington — sidelined with a broken wrist — from Herb Brooks' 1980 Olympic champions.

"I think they've been anxious to get to the games ever since the series with the Soviet Selects (which Team USA won 3-2-1)," Vairo said. "They were looking past a lot of the games early in January. It's understandable. Nobody wanted to get injured and miss the Olympics when they're so close."

The U.S. team has 12 players who would be regulars in the National Hockey League, including goalies March Behrend and Bob Masson and the members of The Diaper Line — center Pat LaFontaine, 18, left wing David A. Jensen, also 18, and right wing Ed Olczyk, 17.

The Americans are as fast as any team, including the vaunted Soviet Nationals. The question is defense.

The Americans face a difficult road for even a shot at the medal.

The top two teams from the Red and Blue Divisions advance to the medal round. Team USA is in the Blue with Czechoslovakia, Canada, Finland, Austria and Norway.

Key games are the first two, against Canada and Czechoslovakia. If the United States can survive without a loss, it should make the medal round.

Vairo said he expects the Soviets to win their division easily, with Sweden second and West Germany, Poland, Italy and Yugoslavia trailing.

The Soviets, defending world champions, will be especially anxious to prove themselves here.

"The only thing they haven't won in recent years was the Olympics," Vairo said. "They've won the world titles and the Canada Cup and the Challenge Cup. They're priming for the Olympics."

Vladislav Tretiak, one of the greatest goaltenders in hockey history, wants to atone for Lake Placid, where he was lifted after one period in the loss to the United States.

The defense is led by Viacheslav

Fetisov, big, fast and strong, and Vasili Pervukhin. The line of Igor Larionov, Vladimir Krutov and Sergei Makarov is unequalled outside the NHL.

"They'll kiss the gold medal," said George Gross, sports editor of the Toronto Sun. "They are by far the best team in the world. They have tremendous depth."

Vairo said the Czechs outplayed the Soviets in the World Championships, but "started running around at the end."

Czech Coach Ludek Bukac's contract ends next year, but he is seeking an NHL job. Nothing would secure one quicker than a gold medal.

Czechs have been hurt by defections, especially by the three Stastny brothers, now with the Quebec Nordiques.

The Czech stars are center Vladimir Ruzicka, right wing Jiri Lala and defenseman Milan Chalupa. Their rising star, left wing Jiri Dudaček, has been slowly recovering from an illness.

Finland has lost three of its best players, right wing Jari Kurri of the Edmonton Oilers, and defensemen Reijo Ruotsalainen of the New York Rangers and Hannu Virta of the Buffalo Sabres. But three former NHL skaters — Matti Hagman, Pekka Rautakallio and Tapio Levo — hope to be eligible. Goalie Hannu Kampuri is considered a standout.

Coach Alpo Suhonen is handling an Olympic team for the first time.

K-State, Buffs to meet in conference contest

The K-State Wildcats will be looking for their first Big Eight Conference victory as they travel to Boulder to face the University of Colorado Buffaloes.

The Buffaloes, 0-3 in conference play and 9-7 overall, are coming off consecutive overtime losses. Wednesday they were defeated by the University of Oklahoma, 100-89, in two overtime periods, and Saturday they were beaten by Oklahoma State University, 76-74 in overtime. Colorado's other loss was to the University of Kansas in their Big Eight opener.

Colorado Head Coach Tom Apke said he is looking forward to the chance to play at home. "Thanks to the schedule maker, we have four of the next five (games) at home. And, if we play good, we'll get well in a hurry," he said.

The Buffaloes have two of the Big Eight's top leading scorers. Senior guard Jay Humphries leads Colorado with a 17.2 points per game average, which is eighth in the conference. The 6-foot-3 Humphries leads the conference in steals averaging 4.3 per contest.

Randy Downs, a 6-foot-9 sophomore guard, is Colorado's second leading scorer with an average of 17.2 per game, which is tenth in the Big Eight.

The Buffaloes also boast the conference's second leading rebounder in junior Alex Stivrins. The 6-foot-8 forward is hauling in 10.1 boards per game.

"It (Colorado) is a tough place to play," said K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman, who added that despite the Buffaloes record, he believes they are "one of the better teams in the conference."

The Wildcats are coming off a tough 83-80 defeat at the hands of the Oklahoma Sooners. Eddie Elder led the way for the 'Cats as he scored 30 points and pulled in 12 rebounds.

"Elder had an outstanding game," Hartman said. "He was covering Wayman Tisdale most of the game. It has to take a lot out of you. I'm sure he slept well."

Lady 'Cats to face Colorado

Two consecutive road contests await the Lady 'Cat basketball squad, beginning with a Big Eight Conference game tonight against the University of Colorado.

The ninth-ranked Lady 'Cats, now 12-3 overall, will be looking for their third straight conference win. They defeated Oklahoma State University, 76-71, and the University of Oklahoma, 88-70, in their only other Big Eight contests.

Colorado, which stands 8-7 overall and 1-1 in conference play, recently defeated OU, 66-62, but suffered a 72-63 road loss to Oklahoma State, Jan. 21.

The home-court advantage will be extremely helpful to Colorado, said Lady 'Cats Head Coach Lynn Hickey, who watched the Buffs deal a 84-67 upset to her squad last season.

"It's tough to play out there (Boulder)," Hickey said. "They're extremely physical, are well-coached and they just don't quit. I expect a very tough contest."

The Lady Buffs are led by four starters averaging more than 10 points a contest, including 5-foot-11 senior Diane Hiemstra, who averages 19 points per outing. Hiemstra scored 28 points in the Buffs' loss to Oklahoma State.

K-State will counter with 6-foot-1 center Angie Bonner (13 points and six rebounds a contest) plus Cassandra Jones and Jennifer Jones, who both are hitting more than 10 points per game. All three are coming off double-figure scoring against OU Jan. 21.

A combination of elements will need to be working tonight in order to key a K-State victory, said Hickey, who hopes for improvement in free-throw shooting, rebounding and the continued success of the Lady 'Cats' fastbreak and outside shooting.

"Our outside people have just really been super," she said.

The Lady 'Cats will follow tonight's Colorado contest with a road game against the University of Kansas Jan. 28 and will return home for a match against Iowa State University Jan. 31.

Pre-game nightmare

By HUEY COUNTS
Sports Editor

After recovering from the shock of watching the Raiders dismantle my beloved Redskins in the Super Bowl, I realized that I had actually viewed something that was more boring than the pre-game show.

And what a pre-game show it was. Two hours of everything you could possibly hope to forget about the Redskin and Raider players. There were interviews with: a tight end who writes poetry, a quarterback who owns a restaurant and a defensive end who hits players on the football field but helps needy children during the offseason. There were interviews with not only fans in Washington and Los Angeles, but also the ones in Oakland. I can't believe they forgot the fans in Flush, Kan.

What could possibly have been the thinking behind a two-hour pre-game show? It was obvious they had to scrape up material to fill the time. I'm a Skins fan, but I didn't really need to see that their bus was still sitting in front of their hotel. I was confident that it wouldn't leave without the players. The weather report from the nation's capital was a great idea — if that's where the game was going to be played. Of course they left plenty of time for commercials. In a way I was glad, because many of them were more entertaining than the pre-game show.

Sports Editor

It may have been the outcome of the game, the extra-long pre-game show, or the four hot dogs covered with spicy barbecue sauce I ate, but for some reason I had the ultimate nightmare the night of the game — The 24-Hour Marathon Super Bowl Pre-Game Show.

A thin, dark-haired man holding a cigarette stepped out from behind a goal post. A football floated past his head, followed by a helmet and then a set of shoulder pads. As Lyle Alzado drifted by, I heard him say, "You have entered a time slot that must be filled, where a man, swept up in Super Bowl hype, is captured by his television set. You have entered the Pre-Game Zone."

The dream was hosted by Dean Martin. He said he didn't want Jerry getting a monopoly on the marathon business. There were countless interviews with players. The conversations were filled with questions such as, "We heard that your wife bought a new poodle. How do you think it will affect the outcome of the game?" and "Will the fact that your father is a washing machine have a bearing on how you handle your linebacking duties?"

There were special insight features on what the players did the night before the game. A cameraman went to each player's room and got candid shots of some players sleeping soundly, while others tossed and turned. Afterwards a psychiatrist analyzed the sleeping habits of the teams to decide who would be better rested going into the game.

There was a live, in-depth interview with a fan in Jakarta, Indonesia, who predicted a Redskin victory because "Hogs" were sacred animals.

The dream even took me to Flush, where the citizens were offering to change the name of Hiney Winery to Butz Winery in honor of the Redskins' Dave Butz.

There also were commercials. Raiders' owner Al Davis spoke for Johnson's Baby Shampoo. Alzado did commercials for Hostess Twinkies and Cupcakes.

I finally woke up from my nightmare just as Jimmy the Greek was tossing a coin to decide who he was going to pick to win the Super Bowl. The way that nightmare went, he probably would have guessed right.

Steel industry backers call for legislation to limit imports

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Steel industry boosters from mill towns to Capitol Hill are hoping that worker layoffs, staggering losses and election-year politics will bring government action to restrict the amount of foreign steel being shipped to the United States.

The most popular strategy calls for industry executives, the United Steelworkers union and steel-state legislators to unite behind a bill that would limit steel imports for five years to 15 percent of total U.S. consumption — substantially less than the current total.

Bethlehem Steel and the USW announced Tuesday that they were pursuing an alternate route to the same goal with a sweeping trade complaint seeking quotas or tariffs against all foreign steel shipments. In their complaint to the International Trade Commission, they contend the imports — fairly traded or not — are eating into their jobs and profits.

"There's no disagreement over objectives. The industry is going down a series of different paths to get there," said Robert Peabody, president of the American Iron and Steel Institute, which has not joined the Bethlehem suit.

The trade group and most of its members, worried that the Bethlehem petition will produce no results or unsatisfactory ones, are lobbying hard for the quota bill.

"We're looking for something that will reduce imports either by agreement or legislation," says Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., chairman of the House Steel Caucus. "We want to see the import bill passed but we'll take what we can get. It probably will have to be some kind of compromise with the White House."

A worldwide steel quota is anathema to the Reagan administration.

Deputy Trade Representative

Robert Lighthizer said at a Jan. 10 briefing. "There's a difference between a global quota and putting limits on imports to resolve an unfair trade suit."

But Sen. John Heinz, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Steel Caucus, said individual trade complaints filed by steel companies against various countries and products would impose barriers "even more stringent" than the proposed 15 percent cap.

"As they (administration officials) become faced with the reality of those suits, they may come to believe the quota legislation will be more helpful than harmful," Heinz said.

Murtha said he doubts the president ever will publicly support an international quota, but he expects unemployment in the industry to grow if the situation does not change.

The steel industry lost more than $6 billion in 1982 and 1983. Employment has rebounded from an all-time low of 151,000 in November 1982 to more than 240,000 a year later, but remains far below the mid-70s peak of 453,000.

The industry is now operating at about 68 percent capacity after having cut nearly 10 percent of its production capacity last year. Further cutbacks are in the offing, as U.S. Steel demonstrated with its plans to close several facilities and eliminate 15,400 positions across the country.

Both labor and management blame the slump on imports, which accounted for 20.3 percent of the U.S. market in the first 11 months of 1983. American steel companies themselves bought nearly 5 percent of the imports in the form of unfinished slabs.

Domestic steel companies historically have opposed worldwide quotas and instead sought tariffs and quotas on a country-by-country, product-by-product basis. But last fall U.S. Steel chairman David Roderick said the industry had reversed its position and will back a blanket quota law.

"It's going to be an uphill job to convince the House, Senate and the administration that this is an appropriate temporary solution," Peabody said. "But we are certainly going to try to do it."

The House quota bill, introduced in November just before Congress recessed for the holidays, has 40 sponsors. Murtha intends to try for 100. With such widespread support and a hearing promised by Florida Democrat Sam Gibbons, chairman of the Ways and Means trade subcommittee, he hopes to force the bill onto the floor.

Heinz said he expects to introduce a quota bill in the Senate after strengthening requirements that profits be reinvested in steelmaking facilities — a provision sought by the union in the House bill as well.

"We want to assure that the benefits of having a quota, which could be considerable profits, simply don't go to banks and shareholders and, for that matter, to labor unions," Heinz said.

A quota would also provide quicker, more efficient relief than the nation's cumbersome trade laws, said Heinz, who has introduced bills to reform those laws. He said the quota bill is the only way to channel industry profits into steel modernization.

Short of approving a worldwide quota, the administration could try to negotiate a voluntary agreement with Third World nations and others responsible for surging imports. The president also could initiate a comprehensive unfair trade case and, if harm to domestic firms is found, impose some combination of duties and quotas on various products.

The latter course was followed last year in the case of stainless and other specialty steel products. The result was a mix of duties and quotas that the industry considered insufficient but better than nothing.

The sky is clear and brilliant blue, although ominous thunderclaps are heard in the distance. A few seconds later, hail stones the size of baseballs crash onto the sunlit landscape. Far away, the life of the city is brought to a standstill by a sudden downpour that will not stop.

So begins The Last Wave, a mesmerizing thriller about the supernatural. Richard Chamberlain stars as David Burton, an Australian lawyer whose defense of five aborigines accused of ritual murder involves him in a series of bizarre and inexplicable experiences. U.S. 'standing tall,' president declares

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan declared in an election-year State of the Union address Wednesday night that "America is back, standing tall," and he sought constitutional power to trim spending and pare the federal deficit — without raising taxes.

And hours after engaging House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill in a bitter exchange over Mideast policy, Reagan told a joint session of Congress he is determined to keep U.S. forces in Lebanon because the United States must never be turned away by "state-sponsored terrorism."

Reagan asked congressional leaders to join him in developing a "down payment" on the federal deficit by enacting "some of the less contentious spending cuts" he already has proposed and by closing tax loopholes. But he rejected a major tax hike as a "Band-Aid solution to cure an illness that has been coming on for half a century."

The president proposed one costly new item himself — a permanently manned space station, costing $8 billion over 10 years, "to develop our next frontier."

He asked for a constitutional amendment to give him "line item" authority to veto selected congressional projects without killing entire money bills — a power long sought and always denied his predecessors. And he repeated his support for a balanced budget amendment that would make it more difficult for Congress to approve red-ink spending. Reagan's own budget plan, due next week, is expected to carry a deficit of $180 billion.

Reagan said his administration will later propose a total overhaul of the federal tax code in "an historic reform for fairness, simplicity and incentives for growth." His timetable called for Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan to draw up recommendations by December — a month after the election.

For the second year in a row, the Democrats used their applause to playfully accentuate their differences with the president. When Reagan said, "We must bring the federal deficits down," they erupted with cheers, before he could continue, to Republican applause, "how we do that makes all the difference." The Democrats were not very subtly reminding Reagan how the deficit has ballooned in his tenure.

His visit to the Capitol was marked by the tightest security measures ever. While Reagan spoke, his wife, Nancy, watched from the gallery. House and Senate members, the Cabinet and diplomats were seated in the chamber. The diplomatic corps arrived en masse aboard buses, as part of the security precautions.

In words directed to Soviet leaders, Reagan said "there is only one sane policy, for your country and mine, to preserve our civilization in this modern age: A nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought."

Talks to reduce medium- and long-range U.S. and Soviet nuclear weapons were broken off by the Soviets following the deployment of new U.S. missiles in Europe. Reagan said the superpowers' arsenals were intended to make sure neither uses the weapons. He asked: "Would it not be better to do away with them entirely?"

He called on the nation to unite "to keep America free, secure and at peace in the '80s," and said that it is now "safer, stronger, and more secure in 1984 than before. We can now move with confidence to seize the opportunities for peace, and we will."

Reagan, asking for bipartisan support "to advance our agenda for peace," made clear his decision to fend off congressional efforts to bring home the U.S. troops in Lebanon before the expiration of their mandate in the spring of 1985.

Reagan, under attack by environmentalists, said he will seek for the Environmental Protection Agency one of the largest percentage budget increases of any agency. But the increase would follow three years of sharp budget cuts at EPA, which environmentalists say reduced its operating level by half that under former President Jimmy Carter.

With the political season in full swing, the speech was seen by the president's aides as a major political document portraying what Reagan views as his major accomplishments in the economy, other domestic policies and foreign affairs.

"There is renewed energy and optimism throughout the land," Reagan said. "America is back, standing tall, looking to the eighties with courage, confidence and hope."

"The heart of America is strong, good, and true," he said. "The cynics were wrong — America never was a sick society."

Class creates TV program, gains experience

Rawn Williams, senior in radio and television, tapes "Campus Edition."

Students in a radio and television course are producing a new campus update show for local TV broadcast.

The 30-minute monthly "Campus Edition" is the class project of five students in Intermediate Television Production under the supervision of Dave Deitch, graduate in radio and television.

The show is aimed mainly at students, faculty and staff, but other community residents may also be interested, Deitch said.

The first show, which airs tonight at 5:30 p.m. on Channel 6, features Larry Pankratz, director of the Community Activities Program, and a student jazz combo called Boplicity.

The desired format for the show will be as varied as possible, Deitch said. The more varied the format, the more production problems can be incurred and, therefore, more experience can be gained.

Students spend from 20 to 100 hours working on the ideas for their programs before entering the studio to turn them into reality, Deitch said.

The first three shows will be a group effort. After March, however, each show will be primarily produced by one of the students, assisted by the other four.

Deitch, who is the executive producer for the program, aids production by providing guidance and locating sources.

He said he will moderate the first show and "after that, it's up to the students."

Under the heat of television lights, Steve Johnson and Mike Gaches, both seniors in electrical engineering and members of the jazz group, Boplicity, practice prior to the taping of their segment on the new monthly televised program to be aired on cable Channel 6.

Forestry head testifies on seventh day of hearing

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry, said Wednesday he was willing to dismiss Ben Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, two months after he became department head in August 1982.

Schultz said he met with Provost Owen Koeppel, John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture, David Mugler, associate dean of instruction of the College of Agriculture, and Richard Seaton, University attorney, to first discuss the idea of dismissing Mahaffey on Oct. 29, 1982.

Up to that time, Schultz said he had only one student complaint about Mahaffey, but had talked with department faculty members and reviewed the history of the department's conflict. At the time, however, the civil suit Mahaffey filed against 10 University administrators was pending. Schultz said Seaton advised the group not to take action until the suit was settled. Proceeding with the dismissal then might be perceived as retaliation against Mahaffey for filing the suit.

Schultz said he didn't believe the dismissal was retaliatory.

"On Oct. 29, 1982, were you prepared to support the dismissal of Dr. Mahaffey?" asked David Schauer, Mahaffey's attorney.

"I believe I would have," Schultz said.

Wednesday was the seventh day of the appeal hearing for Mahaffey's suspension and recommended dismissal. The hearing is predicted to continue through the week.

Accepting Seaton's advice not to dismiss Mahaffey while the law suit was pending, Dunbar instructed Schultz to monitor Mahaffey's presence in the forestry department and report any new developments to him, Schultz said.

In August 1983, two months after Wichita District Judge Patrick Kelly ruled against Mahaffey on two of the complaints in the law suit and refusal to consider the other two, Schultz said he wrote the first draft of Mahaffey's suspension and dismissal recommendation letter.

Schultz, in deciding to draft the dismissal orders, said he referred to an article from the New York University Law Review, which said firing someone is permissible when their presence hinders the function of that organization. Schultz said he believed Mahaffey's presence hindered the department in effectively teaching its students.

The letter was then presented to Mugler, Dunbar, Koeppel and Seaton and hashed out in a more than two-hour meeting, he said.

When Schauer asked who instructed him to draft the letter, Schultz first said Dunbar, but quickly retracted the statement and said he couldn't remember exactly who ordered him to.

Later Schauer asked Schultz if Mahaffey would be able to find another college teaching job if the appeal committee rules Mahaffey is professionally incompetent.

"I am not convinced that it'll be absolutely impossible for Dr. Mahaffey to find employment somewhere in the academic world, even if he is found professionally incompetent," Schultz said. Schauer replied, "Perhaps Siberia."

When he interviewed for the department head position in June 1982, Schultz said he was told about the departmental problems, but not in detail. "The problem was presented as a serious one," he said, adding that he gave no special consideration to the position because of the Mahaffey controversy, but accepted it as part of the job.

"I believe it has to be resolved, it can't go on," he said.

Schultz said he received a letter on Nov. 1, 1982, from Thomas Warner, former forestry faculty member, who said the "working atmosphere in Call Hall had deteriorated" and he couldn't work properly. Schultz said he had found space for Warner in the forestry department's Claflin Road office, but by that time Warner had withdrawn his request.

When reviewing Mahaffey's 1982 faculty evaluation with Mahaffey, Schultz said Mahaffey would not accept the evaluation on which he received a "satisfactory" rating in three areas and an "unacceptable" in another.

Schultz said Mahaffey threatened him by saying he could still amend his law suit to include Schultz. Schultz, however, was never named in the suit. Mahaffey refused to sign the evaluation as required and filed evaluation objections, he said.

But Schultz admitted in cross-examination by Schauer that, because he was new to the department, he had relied upon the comments of other forestry faculty members for the evaluation, which he said he shouldn't have done.

"I listened to Dr. Mahaffey, talked with him and that's about it. I also listened and talked to others in the department," he said, before deciding Mahaffey's problems within the department couldn't be resolved.

Schultz said that in October 1982, a student in one of Mahaffey's classes came to him and said she refused to return to the class. The student claimed Mahaffey was grading unfairly, referring to his faculty grievances in class, unwilling to accept ideas that might oppose his own and had told the student she should not support Warner just because he was her friend.

Warner arranged for the student to finish the class and take other classes taught by Mahaffey through independent study.

"This was the kind of effect the problems were having on the department," Schultz said. "My major concern was that we would have 15 more students like this." But, he said, no other students described the same type of fear.

Soviet arsenal increases in East Germany

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A new, more accurate Soviet medium-range nuclear missile that could pose a wider threat to Western Europe has been spotted in East Germany for the first time, U.S. intelligence sources said Wednesday.

That sighting of an SS-22 rocket could mark the start of the weapon's deployment on Soviet allied territory in response to placement of new U.S. intermediate-range missiles in Western Europe, said the sources, who spoke only on condition they remain anonymous.

The 560-mile-range SS-22, developed to replace old SS-12 missiles, never before has been deployed outside the Soviet Union, the sources said.

The SS-22 was seen at Bernsdorf, East Germany, about 33 miles west of the Polish border, the sources said. From such a position, the SS-22 could hit targets throughout West Germany, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, as well as part of Britain, France and Italy.

The sources refused to say how the missile at Bernsdorf was discovered for security reasons.

Last November, Assistant Defense Secretary Richard Perle indicated deployment of SS-22 missiles in Eastern Europe would increase the potential nuclear threat to NATO countries.

"If the Soviets move the SS-22s very far forward, it would extend target coverage" in Western Europe, Perle said at the time.

The nuclear arms race in Europe surged after the Soviets began deploying mobile SS-20 missiles in the late 1970s.

Committee forms to reallocate Nichols Hall gallery fund

By DIANE KERSTING
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate approval pending, a newly formed committee of faculty members and students will meet during the next few months to decide the use of $10,000 allocated to the Nichols Gymnasium Account by Senate for a proposed art gallery in Nichols Hall.

Selections for the committee were announced Wednesday by Student Body President Jerry Katlin. Voting members, in addition to Katlin, senate chairman Lori Leu and K-State art curator Jessica Richmond, include Bill Sullivan, graduate in landscape architecture; Melissa Helfrich, junior in landscape architecture; Lindsay Smith, senior in fine arts; Vicki Kandt, junior in elementary education and Jeff Setzer, junior in architectural engineering.

The positions were filled following interviews with 25 applicants earlier this week.

Besides voting members, ex-officio members will include one representative each from the Department of Speech, the Department of Computer Science and University Facilities. These departments were chosen because upon completion of Nichols Hall, both the departments of speech and computer science will be housed in the building, Katlin said. University Facilities was chosen because of its concern with the overall appearance of the campus.

The Nichols Gymnasium Account was established in 1975 when Senate allocated $10,000 for it. According to Katlin, the fund was instituted to portray the students' commitment to the preservation of Nichols and to contribute to the construction of an art gallery in the renovated building.

A Manhattan architectural firm donated renovation plans which included room for a gallery. However, the architectural plans have been altered, leaving no room for an art gallery.

Instead of an art gallery, the committee will look at different types of artwork which could be placed in the lobby of Nichols, including paintings, sculptures and mobiles. The committee will make its decision and solicit bids from artists. It will then select an artist and commission him to complete the desired artwork.

"Since past experience tells us that it takes from 12 to 15 months for an artist to complete a project of this size, we'd like to have an artist chosen by the end of the semester, but it is flexible. We won't force it," Katlin said.

K-State juniors win debate honors

Eighteen teams from ten regional schools competed at the 42nd annual Pittsburg State University Debate Invitational. The tournament featured eight preliminary rounds of power-matched competition and two elimination rounds.

Doug Micheel, junior in political science, and Brad Russell, junior in pre-law, compiled an 8-0 preliminary record, defeating teams from Emporia State University, the University of Kansas, Washburn University and Henderson State College.

In the semifinal round against Emporia, Micheel and Russell defended the concept of an environmental ethic and won the decision 3-0. In finals, they beat a KU team on a 2-1 decision.

Russell also received an award for being the top speaker at the tournament and Micheel placed fourth individually.

Scientists study appetite control

Scientists are studying methods for controlling the appetites of food-producing animals. Their findings may have long-term implications for both animal production and human appetite control.

One research scientist in that area, Clifton Baile, explained some of his findings on appetite control to some 150 participants on Tuesday during the 39th annual Kansas Formula Feed Conference at K-State.

Baile is a senior fellow in the Nutritional Chemicals Division of Monsanto Co. and an associate professor at the Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis.

Baile said he is finding ways to modify the metabolism and behavior of animals that were previously unknown.

Trials of cameras-in-courts progress smoothly in state

By The Associated Press

OLATHE — An experiment allowing cameras in certain Kansas district courtrooms has proceeded smoothly through two murder trials in Johnson County, trial judges said.

Associate District Judge Earle Jones suggested that Kansas Supreme Court rules governing the conduct of photographers in the courtroom should be relaxed further.

"I think the rules are too restrictive. I think we should leave it up to the professionals and keep the non-professionals out of it. We will just fuf it up," Jones said Tuesday.

Jones, who presided at the trial of Floyd French, a Missouri man convicted of voluntary manslaughter last week, said he believes photographers should not be required to stay in the courtroom until a break in the proceedings.

"We need to be a little looser so they can be sure to meet their deadlines," he said.

The Johnson County district is one of four in the state allowing cameras and tape recorders in courtrooms as part of a one-year experiment by the Kansas Supreme Court. The rule allows pool coverage, with one still camera and one television camera in a courtroom.

Cameras traditionally have been prohibited in trial courtrooms, but Kansas became the 12th state to permit trial coverage on an experimental basis Jan. 1. The state has permitted cameras and tape recorders in appellate court proceedings since 1982.

Judge Lewis Smith, who presided at the trial of Michael Peterson, who was convicted of first-degree murder in the slaying of a Christian Science Reading room attendant, said photographers at the trial "did a good job. I would like to give them a special commendation."

The judges said they received no complaints about photographers from either prosecutors or defense lawyers. Smith said the only complaint he received was from jurors who did not want to be filmed by television crews as they left the court after the trial.

Carlin proposes tests for basic skills

Educators debate competency tests

By MIKE TURNER
Government Editor

The Kansas Senate Education Committee heard arguments Tuesday concerning Gov. John Carlin's proposal to require minimum competency-based testing of children in all Kansas schools.

The proposal would require schools to administer state tests to determine the competency of children in grades two, four, six, eight and 11.

The proposal also would require that such testing be conducted in the 1984-85 school year and the next four succeeding school years in every school district and every accredited non-public school in the state.

According to the proposal, the purpose of the program is to determine if pupils are satisfactorily attaining minimum competency objectives in basic reading and mathematics skills.

Robert Clemons, representing the state Board of Education, said he recommends passage of the bill in its current form. He said the Board of Education had discussed the bill at length and found it to be a positive step forward in education.

"We consider this to be a crucial piece of legislation to be addressed by this Legislature," Clemons said.

Legislature '84

Nancy Lindberg, president of the Kansas-National Educators' Association, said she is not opposed to continued testing of students as long as the purpose of the testing is to improve the educational system.

However, Lindberg said she thinks giving the test to pupils in the second grade is too early. Some young children have been frustrated to the point of tears by having to take the tests, she said.

"We hope you study to see if this (the second grade test) is really necessary," she said.

Lindberg also said the Legislature should require the last test to be administered in the tenth grade rather than the eleventh.

"Giving the test in the tenth grade gives a chance for remediation," Lindberg said.

Owen Henson, representing the United School Administrators, said he agrees the last test should be administered in the tenth grade. This would allow a full two years to correct any learning area deficiencies, he said.

Henson said he also thinks a tenth grade test would be a more accurate reflection of what the children are learning because the majority of students are still enrolled in English and math at that time.

Sen. Charlie Angell, R-Plains, acknowledged that testing earlier would provide more time to teach students in areas where they need improvement.

However, Angell questioned whether administrators could determine the basic skills knowledge students graduate with by testing early.

Henson also said he supports an amendment to the bill providing the option for each school district to develop local tests to determine competency. The local tests would have to meet some pre-determined standard set by the state, he said.

Henson, who also is the assistant superintendent of Topeka Unified School District No. 501, said his district feels positive about the tests it has developed. He said the tests have had a positive influence on the educational program.

Angell said his biggest fear of a state-wide testing system stems from the fact that a society's standards of excellence evolve from measurements such tests would provide. He said he wonders how teachers would keep the minimum state standards from becoming goals of excellence.

In a separate issue, Jerry Slaughter, lobbyist for the Kansas Travel Agency, asked the committee to consider legislation which would prohibit Kansas schools from opening until after Labor Day.

Angell said he does not think the proposal has a chance of passing the Legislature. The committee did not discuss the proposal at length.

Lafene acquires device to check blood sugar

By KARRA PORTER
Staff Writer

A new machine, called Accu-Check Blood Glucose, recently purchased by Lafene Student Health Center, will enable diabetics on campus to measure their blood sugar content quickly and accurately.

Diabetes results when either some of the insulin-producing cells in the pancreas are not functioning (in adult-onset diabetes), or none of the insulin-producing cells are functioning (juvenile-onset), Cindy Culver Burke, Lafene health educator, said.

Blood sugar and insulin counteract each other, she said. If blood sugar is too high, insulin is too low and vice versa. Diabetics must always be aware of their sugar levels to determine if there is a need for more insulin or sugar intake.

The need to monitor blood sugar level increases when a diabetic engages in strenuous activity or strays from his restricted diet, Burke said. Any type of activity can set off a bodily reaction in response to excessive or depleted sugar levels.

"If you go out to Aggieville and get drunk and you have too much alcohol, that can set it off. If you're under a lot of stress — if it's test time and it's really taking a lot more of your energy level, then you're not going to have enough sugar to compensate," she said.

In the past, diabetics have been able to check their blood sugar levels through a check of their urine. However, recent research indicates the urine check is not as accurate as a blood check for sugar levels.

Only recently have diabetics been able to check their blood sugar levels at home, Burke said.

In the home test, blood taken from a pricked finger is put on the sensor end of a thin strip, which turns colors. The shade of color produced indicates the level of blood sugar content, she said.

Burke said this method is not foolproof, however. The results of this method depend on the accuracy of self-administering the test, the accuracy of reading the test and the margin for error in the strip itself.

The new machine is more accurate because the machine reads the strip sensor and indicates the exact blood sugar content, eliminating the guesswork of interpreting the color shades, Burke said. The machine also automatically checks to make sure the test strip is good.

Lafene got the machine at a reduced rate, but an individual would probably have to pay between $150 and $200, which puts it out of reach of many diabetic students, Burke said.

Burke said there are many diabetics on campus, but she doesn't know the exact number because many of them don't use Lafene. She said she is concerned that many diabetics are not aware of Lafene's services. For example, some may not know that the Lafene pharmacy offers insulin and syringes at a lower cost than commercial pharmacies.

Peace Corps recruiters seek student volunteers

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Collegian Reporter

Today is the last day Peace Corps representatives Dana Hamm and Mike Kammerdiener will sponsor a booth in the Union to provide information about the volunteer agency that provides technical assistance and cultural exchanges to underdeveloped countries.

Hamm, a K-State graduate, has been with the corps for about four years, two of those years as an agricultural adviser at the University of Costa Rica.

"I worked like an extension agent trying to solve agricultural problems and giving suggestions on when is the best time to plant crops to make the most money," Hamm said.

Hamm is one of more than 250 K-State graduates who have participated in the Peace Corps since the program began in 1961. It has since sent 100,000 volunteers to more than 60 countries.

The corps offers services in areas of forestry, fishery, agriculture, architecture, community development, science, engineering, social work, business, nutrition and education.

"Right now the biggest demand is in the area of agriculture, with education second," Hamm said.

A person must be 18 years old and a United States citizen to apply for entrance into the Peace Corps, but there is no upper age limit. Most applicants are single, but married couples can apply if both have skills that can be used in their project area. Couples with dependents are usually not accepted. Many handicapped people also have served through the program.

The minimum term of service in the corps is two years. The corps offers a job search service to volunteers returning to the United States to help them find permanent jobs.

While in the program, each volunteer receives medical care, a basic living allowance, training in the native language and culture, round-trip transportation and an adjustment allowance of $175 for every month of service. The living allowance covers housing, food, essentials and spending money that averages $300.

When the volunteers return from their assignment, they receive an adjustment allowance which averages about $4,500.

Home schooling has drawbacks

Home schooling is an alternative to public school systems that, unfortunately, is becoming increasingly popular in the United States.

Home schooling doesn't require a child to leave the home environment to obtain a formal education. The curriculum and teaching are provided by the child's parents.

Parents can limit their children's intellectual and social growth by restricting them to only one personal frame of reference.

Primary and secondary schools offer a variety of courses in arts and sciences and vocational areas. It is hard to conceive a home fully equipped with a biology lab and research library of the same scope of most public or private schools.

The other side of the educational coin is social adjustment. Social interactions with other children are just as important as "book learning." In the public school environment, children are given the opportunity to form relationships with their peers as well as adults.

Many home school advocates are fundamentalists with deep religious convictions. Because they are often interested in giving their children religious training, they use the "poor quality of public education" argument as an excuse for this alternative. They also fear their child will adopt new ideas different than their own — ideas they see as unfit or bad.

Thus the parents' personal conflict becomes the child's problem. Because children's learning can be limited by their parents, they may be unable to explore new ideas and form their own opinions. The parent can smother the child's intellectual and social growth.

The state has an obligation to ensure everyone an education for the betterment of self and society. This obligation is the primary task of teachers and administrators. They are trained not only to educate, but also to recognize learning disabilities and other deficiencies that may impair a child's growth — a realization some parents may ignore.

Even if the state condoned home schooling, it would still impose controls on this alternative. Where would the line be drawn between those parents qualified and those unqualified to formally educate their children at home? Who would have the final word in the decision process?

Education begins in the home, and it is important that the child has parents who care enough to provide an environment conducive to learning. Just as important is a parental attitude that encourages learning as a way of life. But formal education is best obtained outside the home.

Reagan's aim off in outer space

And the budget farce continues...

President Reagan's proposed fiscal 1985 budget contains $150 million as an initial investment in a manned orbiting space station to herald America's "future in space." Furthermore, preliminary White House financing calls for $6 billion to be allocated to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration over the next five years to develop the station.

Reagan wants to "recapture the vision of Apollo," White House science adviser George Keyworth said.

Actually, the president is making a patriotic appeal to beat the Soviets to a prominent place in space. This is a step beyond his frenetic nuclear buildup plans. This is sheer folly.

If Ronald Reagan thinks all America has to worry about is keeping up with the Soviets and developing technology to rule the skies, he should be brought back to earth immediately. Why doesn't he spend money where it is needed? He obviously is passing off financing domestic and social programs in favor of creating more serious global commitments.

While in office, Reagan has cut funding for education, child care, student financial aid and programs for the needy, among others, not only to help finance an expansive nuclear buildup, but also to protect his corporate supporters.

Of course, along with several European countries and Japan, many American industrial companies are interested in the space station for apparent profit motives. In a bid for re-election, Reagan will have the continued support of these American business interests. In November, however, he may face a block of disillusioned voters who question his beliefs of what's good for the country.

Cary Grant's birthday: good news

WASHINGTON — A little good news. This month we — not to mention he — celebrate the 80th birthday of one Archie Leach, born in England, raised on the stage, matured in film and now enshrined in our memory as the essence of style and grace. Ladies and gentlemen, I give you Cary Grant.

For almost 50 years now, Cary Grant has been a major, if not the dominant, film star. He's retired now, living (I hope) on yachts, changing his clothes several times a day, never losing his crease, dressing for dinner, opening the door for women, saying just the right thing, impressing head waiters, knowing just how much to tip, being humorous without ever being ridiculous — and most important — doing it all effortlessly.

An admission, I always wanted to be Cary Grant. I know, of course, that Cary Grant is Cary Grant and the part is taken, but I wanted to be something like him. Other kids wanted to be ballplayers or firemen, but not me. I wanted to be Cary Grant.

The funny thing is that Cary Grant wanted the same thing. As Richard Schickel tells us in his book, "Cary Grant — A Celebration," there was nothing about Grant's early life to foreshadow the man he eventually became. He was born into the lower middle class, the child of Elias and Elsie Leach — he a garment cutter with a weakness for the grape, she a housewife with an equally serious problem, insanity. When Grant was nine, his mother was institutionalized and he did not see her for 25 years. By then, he was a movie star: "I was known to most of the world by sight and by name, yet not to my mother," he once said.

So Cary Grant was his own creation. He simply invented himself, modifying a pronounced British accent, learning how to dress — turning himself into the epitome of the mid-century man. He was a gentleman without virtue of money, without virtue of a gentleman's education — with no clubs and no social connections. He took the name Cary from a character in a play ("Nikki") and Grant from a list of short last names. Cary Grant was born — born again, we might now say.

His is the ultimate democratic story. Grant, like the equally humbly born Fred Astaire, became the essence of urban sophistication by simply wanting to be that. Of course, he was born with his looks and his remarkably ageless body, but the rest — the clothes, the manner, the strangely unplaceable accent — was all his own invention. He decided what he would be and then went out and became it.

And yet Grant can be seen as something else entirely: undemocratic. The movies in which Cary Grant really played Cary Grant — movies about charm and culture, movies where people dressed for dinner, always had something clever to say and never sweated — seemed elitist. Now, Hollywood has been turning out movies in which the male stars wear T-shirts, drive pickups and drink beer. This is realism, no doubt, but it also is a celebration of the obvious. Richard Gere, for instance, is Richard Gere — good-looking, sexy. There is no art to him, no packaging. There is no sense aspiring to be Richard Gere because he aspires to be nothing else.

I could never be Grant, either, of course. But I could try. I could learn how to dress well. I could watch my speech. I could master etiquette and manners. I could, you see, rise above my origins, my education, my (limited) looks. I could never do that in a T-shirt. In a T-shirt the world would always kick sand in my face. In a tux and camel-hair coat, though, I can be something else — something better.

I suppose the same thing applies to women. Clothes, makeup — all these can be rungs on the ladder of self-improvement. But a bikini, a Flashdance sweatshirt — these are assertions of the explicit. They keep you in your place, which is, for lots of people, the last place they want to be.

Ticket price highest in conference

In the last few days, I've read a few articles about how the crowds this year at Ahearn lack enthusiasm and numbers. These people seem to think the student body has lost its school spirit.

But they are missing the point here. The root of the problem isn't the expected poor season. K-State has gone through other seasons when things looked bleak and Ahearn was still filled to capacity.

A few letters to the Collegian hit it on the nose last semester by protesting the $42.25 ticket price. This seems like a lot to pay for a season ticket. Especially when it includes national powers like Eastern Washington, Centenary and Southern Colorado.

I didn't realize how much the athletic department was screwing the students until I went home for Christmas. In talking to a University of Kansas student, I found out students at KU only pay $26 for a 13-game season ticket. A Nebraska student said their season ticket was $13 for 13 games. When I returned to school my roommate told me a friend of his at the University of Missouri spent $26 for a season ticket.

Finally, to end any doubt that I and the rest of the student basketball

BRIAN SMITH
Guest Columnist

fans were getting taken to the cleaners on ticket prices, I called the University of Oklahoma. A full season of watching one of the most prominent players in the history of college basketball, Wayman Tisdale, in one of the newest facilities in the conference and the nation, Lloyd Noble Arena, cost a token $20 for 14 games.

Who sets these outrageous prices? Are they trying to take even more money from the students to fund the new coliseum? Students are already paying $33 a year for the coliseum. If ticket prices are kept at the current price of $3.25 a game, we won't need a new coliseum because Ahearn won't sell out again.

I'm sure many other students would like an explanation for this rip-off. If the athletic department wants a full house and a wild and rowdy student crowd, they should try lowering ticket prices about $1.50 a game and season tickets next year to about $20.

Since I'm sure the athletic department wouldn't dream of lowering the prices, the students will just have to stop attending games in future years, especially if prices keep going up at the pace they have been. My freshman year, 1980, I spent $24 for 12 games (already high in comparison to Big Eight schools now). This year the price is $42.25 for 13 games. Over four years that is a 62.5 percent per game increase. Tuition hasn't even gone up that much since 1980. If such price increases continue, this year's freshmen will pay $68.66 in four years for 13 games. Even if the athletic department keeps the current price, it will probably take 10 years for the rest of the Big Eight Conference to catch up with K-State's rip-off scheme.

Maybe we should limit the fans at Wildcat games to only the upper class.

Editor's note: Brian Smith is a senior in bakery science and management.

Letters

Past student leaders willing to commit fees

Editor,

Re: James W. Lero's letter, "Alumnus advocates funding for coliseum," in the Jan. 24 Collegian.

In his opening comments, Lero implies that the 1979 student referendum (in which all K-State students were given the opportunity to vote) is responsible for the present fee students are paying on the coliseum.

According to files in the Student Governing Association office, the 1974 referendum called for a total student input of up to $2.5 million dollars. The referendum passed. Three months later the Student Senate voided the referendum when it realized that not $2.5 million but approximately $6 million of student monies would be needed.

In an internal report dated Feb. 10, 1981 from Angela Scanlan, then student body president, and two co-workers to eight University administrators, the student leaders acknowledge that a $6.6 million contribution would be a "tremendous burden on students," but note: "Although we are not able to commit students to $6.6 million right now, we are willing to put ourselves on the line to sell this position if we have a unified voice behind us."

By November 1981, $5.5 million had apparently become a "saleable" figure and student senators voted to more than double the original student body pledge.

Abortion insurance issue starts conflict

By The College Press Service

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — What began as an omission in the brochures describing the University of Virginia's student health insurance has turned into a campuswide fray over funding student abortions.

A number of students now want to make insurance coverage for abortions an option at Virginia, although efforts to split insurance have failed at other campuses.

A group of University of California students, for example, lost an eight-year battle to withhold the portion of their student health fees that went toward abortion counseling when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against them in 1983.

And though it is very common for colleges to have separate coverage costs for pregnancy insurance, it is illegal, according to Margaret Dunkle of the Equality Center in Washington, D.C.

Students who challenged separate pregnancy coverage at Stanford last spring, she said, successfully forced the university to cover pregnancy and pregnancy complications.

Dunkle says all such separate coverages are vulnerable to student appeals. Where it has been raised, it has generally been fixed because of Title IX of the Higher Education Amendments of 1972.

Title IX forbids schools receiving federal funds to discriminate on the basis of gender.

Anti-abortion Virginia students are challenging the university's coverage of abortion on Title IX grounds. They say it discriminates against men, who must pay for coverage they'll never use personally.

Student Council members John Doyon and Rory Clark introduced a measure to make abortion coverage optional "so that those not wanting to directly support abortion don't have to," Doyon said.

"I was personally uncomfortable with the fact that no one knew (abortion was automatically covered)," he said.

So Doyon and Clark wrote a letter, to be included in all insurance mail students receive, alerting students to the automatic coverage.

They also asked university lawyer George Gratton, who, Doyon said, told them Title IX doesn't cover student insurance because the insurance is optional.

"If all students were required to buy the policy, then it would be different," Doyon was told.

Gratton wouldn't return reporters' repeated phone calls.

The issue of whether all school programs are covered under Title IX — as opposed to just those campus programs receiving federal funds — is unresolved. The U.S. Supreme Court is expected to deliver a Title IX ruling sometime later in 1984.

For the moment, Doyon has proposed a plan, recommended by the school's insurance company, that would make students who want abortion coverage pay an extra dollar for it.

Students Health Committee (SHC) Chairman Richard Keeling, however, said Doyon is being unrealistic.

The cost of the abortion coverage would depend on how many students buy it. The SHC estimates students would end up paying about $150 extra, not $1.

In that case, Keeling said, it would probably cost as much to buy the coverage as it would be to have an abortion.

Moreover, "a lot of women here are very concerned. Eliminating this coverage places them at some considerable risk," Keeling said.

Last school year, the campus health service referred 100-150 Virginia women for abortions.

About 40 percent of the students responding to a survey favor instituting some kind of dual insurance system.

Keeling's committee, however, is weighing Doyon's plan, and will make its recommendations in the spring.

Dunkle doesn't think a dual system would live too long.

"People who don't smoke have to pay for lung cancer," she said. "That's the whole idea behind insurance. It is pooling the risk and spreading the cost. Women have to pay for testicular cancer treatments, and men have to pay for breast cancer treatments."

Metabolism disruption may cause birth defects

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — A small disruption in sugar metabolism during the first month of pregnancy may be responsible for a variety of birth defects, including major malformations of the brain and spinal cord, animal research suggests.

Scientists found that high levels of one form of sugar could disrupt glycolysis, the process of breaking down sugars and other carbohydrates which produces the energy which embryos need to form major organs early in their development.

Dr. Norbert Freinkel, who directed the study, noted that the causes of about 60 percent of all birth defects are unknown.

"This raises the possibility," he said, "that perhaps a variety of environmental factors or across-the-counter drugs or other things could impair glycolysis at that very critical period and perhaps be implicated in some congenital lesions."

The doctors found that when rat embryos were exposed to a sugar called mannose during the ninth through 12th day of growth, all of them developed malformed neural tubes.

A neural tube is the primitive structure which develops into the brain and spinal cord.

"In practical terms, neural tube defects occur in about 2 out of every 1,000 births in the United States," Freinkel said. "This is probably the most devastating congenital lesion" and results in malformations of the spine and brain, he said.

He said there is little chance mannose causes birth defects in humans because it never reaches high enough levels in the blood to be harmful. But a variety of other substances, including drugs and foods, might do so by interfering with embryo metabolism during the first month of pregnancy.

"The alarming thing is that the analogous stage in human pregnancies is day 18 to 28 of pregnancy, a time when many women don't even know they're pregnant," Freinkel said.

The study, conducted at Northwestern University Medical School in Chicago, was published in the Jan. 19 issue of the New England Journal of Medicine.

The doctors called their discovery the honeybee syndrome, because mannose has long been known to be poisonous to honeybees.

Freinkel said the next step will be to use rat embryos to test the effects of a variety of substances with which pregnant women may come in contact.

Efficient use of school computers to be studied

By The College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Many of the computer programs used in the nation's schools amount to nothing more than expensive, "electronic page-turning" devices, said U.S. Education Department Secretary Terrel Bell.

In an informal office meeting with wire service reporters, Bell also revealed plans to finance research to find more constructive ways of using computers to help students learn math and writing skills.

The current use of computers in schools and colleges is "almost a fad," Bell said, and the available education programs leave much to be desired in terms of interacting with the mind of the student.

The education department plans to target research funding to develop programs for pre-algebra and algebra courses, in which many average students "bomb out...never to come back again," Bell said.

Young Kennedy faces drug charges

RAPID CITY, S.D. — Robert F. Kennedy Jr. faces a hearing next month on drug charges after being unable to appear in court Wednesday because of bad weather on the East Coast.

Kennedy, 29, son of the late New York senator, is scheduled to appear Feb. 17 on a felony charge of heroin possession. He was charged Sept. 16, five days after becoming ill on an airplane flight to Rapid City.

Prosecutors said Kennedy is expected to waive a preliminary hearing and plead innocent when he makes his initial appearance.

Shortly after the Rapid City incident, Kennedy admitted himself to a New Jersey hospital for treatment of a drug problem.

Reagan says he stopped robbery

NEW YORK — President Reagan says he once broke up an armed robbery on the sidewalk outside his apartment by pointing an unloaded revolver out the window and telling the holdup man to "drop it."

The president recalled the incident in an interview for the February issue of Sports Illustrated magazine.

Reagan said that when he was a young sportscaster in Des Moines, Iowa, he was sleeping in his apartment when he was awakened by the sound of voices on the sidewalk outside. A woman said, "Take anything but leave me alone!" Reagan recalled.

When he looked down, he saw a nurse with her hands up facing a man with a pistol. Reagan said he grabbed his own .45-caliber automatic revolver, pointed it over the window sill and called down, "Drop it...and get going."

"After one peek upward into the yawning muzzle of the .45, the armed would-be robber turned and fled," the president recalled.

Reagan then donned a robe and escorted the nurse to the hospital across the street.

"I didn't tell her that I had no ammunition for the gun, which had just been given to me," Reagan said.

Reagan, who said he thinks "law-abiding citizens have a right to bear arms," added that he owns several guns and shoots left-handed.

Man convicted of mailing snake

WAYCROSS, Ga. — A 43-year-old man was convicted in federal court Wednesday of mailing a live rattlesnake to his wife's former husband.

The U.S. District Court jury deliberated a little more than an hour before finding James T. Carter, of Alma, guilty of mailing an injurious article to Joey V. Tanner. Tanner previously had been married to Carter's wife, Geneva.

Defense attorneys suggested that Tanner, of Nicholls, mailed the snake to himself in order to implicate Carter.

"This is just not reasonable," countered Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Weddle in closing arguments. "Wouldn't he have put the proper ZIP code on it, not the Alma ZIP code where Mr. Carter lives?"

Defense attorney George Hoyt told the jurors that Tanner was in the habit of tanning snake hides and could have mailed the rattlesnake to himself. He also argued that prosecutors had not proven their case.

"It's easy to get someone indicted," Hoyt said. "But the question is, who caught the snake, who put it in the box and who mailed it? That's the question you must decide."

Tanner testified that a few days before he received the rattlesnake in the mail, Carter telephoned him saying, "You only have a few days to live."

Rome may cease to be 'sacred city'

Italy seeks to sever ties with Vatican

By The Associated Press

ROME — The Socialist leader of Italy proposed major changes Wednesday in ties with the Vatican. Roman Catholicism would not be the state religion and Rome would cease to be a "sacred city."

The changes, which Premier Bettino Craxi presented to Parliament, are in a proposed revision of the Holy See's 54-year-old concordat with the Italian state and are the fruit of 15 years of negotiations between the Vatican and the increasingly secular Italian state.

In a 50-minute TV speech, he said the revisions would overcome what he called the current "unsuitable and anachronistic" ties.

The changes would not alter the status of Vatican City as an independent state in the heart of Rome run by the pope.

Most Italians are Catholics, but divorce is legal and the country has one of Western Europe's most liberal abortion laws, and Italian voters have rebuffed church-backed bids to overturn those laws.

The proposals reflect Italy's secular trend, with the church giving up many privileges but retaining others — including financial ones.

Under Craxi's proposal, religious education would be given only to children whose parents sought it; special privileges no longer would be given to arrested clerics, and Rome would lose the "sacred city" designation allowing banning of books the church found unacceptable.

Craxi, who has personally taken over the last phase of negotiations, asked the Senate to back government efforts to complete the accord. He is expected to go before the lower house of Parliament Thursday.

Craxi reportedly is seeking agreement between the government and the Vatican by Feb. 11, anniversary of the pact between Pope Pius XI and Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini. Six more months of talks would be allowed to settle the problems of religious institutes and charities.

The Vatican has made no official comment on the new plan. The Vatican negotiating team is headed by its foreign affairs minister, Archbishop Achille Silvestrini. Craxi leads the government team.

One of the stickiest topics was change in the religious education in public schools. Under the old plan, all elementary schools students had to take religious instruction unless they asked to be exempted.

And as recently as the 1960s, prosecutors acting on complaints from church groups succeeded in banning books, plays and movies deemed offensive to the pope, on the grounds of the concordat's definition of Rome as a "sacred city." But city newsstands are now swamped with hardcore pornography and Romans routinely see nudity on TV.

Other changes would drop the provision that an arrested cleric get "special treatment." A priest's bishop now is privately notified and the priest gets a cell to himself. Priests still would be exempt from military service.

One problem still unresolved is the tax status of charities and hundreds of religious institutions not part of Vatican City or its extraterritorial property.

The proposal protects those with religious goals. But Craxi proposed a mixed commission make study them to weed out those with commercial ends and report back within six months of the signing of the revised concordat and before it is ratified.

Elementary students produce child abuse film

By The Associated Press

MARIETTA, Ga. — A group of elementary school students who want to "make a contribution to the community" have produced, written and acted in a seven-minute film about child abuse.

"I was surprised at the seriousness of the acting," Stan Lynch, a teacher at Banberry Elementary School, said Wednesday. "That was my biggest question, whether they could actually place themselves in a role like that."

"But fear was something that they definitely understood, and when you see these kids acting it out, it really paints a picture of what child abuse is really like," he said.

Lynch said the 24 students in his language arts class decided to make a film as their entry in the Georgia Student Media Festival and chose the topic of child abuse because they had just read a book on the subject as a class assignment.

Each student wrote a script, and then the class as a whole selected 10-year-old Kizmat Lester's script for the final production, Lynch said. The seven actors in the production were selected by a vote of the class, with the other students taking the jobs of producer, sound engineer, prop crew and cameramen.

"None of the students had experience in sound or video before,"

Lynch said, "and they had to be responsible for a lot of the work on their own time. But they went with it and did it."

"The kids wanted to make this as realistic as possible. They understand the seriousness of the problem and wanted to make a contribution to the community through this production."

In the film, "Child Abuse From the Eyes of the Student," Kizmat plays a young girl who is abused regularly by her mother.

The mother punishes her for not cleaning her room, so Kizmat and her sister and brother in the movie retreat to a neighbor's house for help and protection.

When a police officer arrives to investigate, the mother begins making excuses to explain Kizmat's injuries. "She fell on the steps and hit her head," the mother says. "She's always making up lies."

The police officer is not convinced by the mother's story, and the children are taken away to live in a shelter. The film ends with the mother beginning counseling sessions with a social worker.

Kizmat said she hopes the film will relay the message to other students that "if they've got a friend who's getting abused, they should help them or get someone who can help them like a social worker."

Stephan announces rules for DUI checklanes

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert Stephan made public Wednesday a set of 13 guidelines which he advised local law enforcement officials in Kansas to follow if they set up checklanes to try to catch drunken drivers or people driving without licenses.

In a letter dated Tuesday, Stephan told law officers he based the guidelines on his reading of a recent state Supreme Court ruling which said such checklanes are permissible if certain conditions are observed.

"The court outlined various conditions and circumstances in which checklanes meet constitutional standards of acceptability, and we must strive to meet these conditions," Stephan said in his letter.

"The guidelines...were drafted with the understanding that checklanes can be a valuable deterrent to those who might otherwise ignore the rules of the road. We must always remember that the protection of the public must always begin with the protection of individual liberty."

Stephan's guidelines included:

—Permissible scope. Barring reasonable suspicion that a law has been violated, the check should be limited to examining the driver's license, registration and vehicle license tag, along with obvious equipment defects, observation of the driver's condition and "plainly visible portions of the vehicle."

—Designated location. Supervisory officers should decide where to establish the checklanes, "after consideration of all specific factors applicable."

—Time and duration. Supervisory officers also should determine when the checklane operations begin and how long they should continue.

—Standards. Supervisory officers should decide in advance which vehicles will be checked, and it should be by set interval; i.e., every second or third vehicle if every passing vehicle is not being checked.

—Advance public notice. News media which inquire should be told at least six hours in advance so the checklanes can be publicized.

—Advance warning to driver. Either signs or uniformed officers should be stationed in both directions a distance from the checklanes.

—Safety. Public safety should be the prime consideration in every aspect of planning and carrying out the checklanes.

—Fear or anxiety. Unnecessary displays of force, brandishing of weapons or abnormally delaying drivers should be avoided.

—Average detention time. The average time of detaining drivers should not exceed three minutes from the advance warning point to completion of the routine check.

—Physical characteristics of location. The area picked for the checklanes should be well lighted and have sufficient room to accommodate vehicles and pedestrians safely.

—Other possible methods. The court specifically approves use of roving patrols looking for vehicles being driven erratically, and stationary observation posts in areas of high violation frequency.

—Checking effectiveness. Supervisory officers should maintain records of arrests and citations resulting from the checklanes.

—Other points. Conforming to these guidelines will enhance court acceptance of use of the checklanes. Random stopping of motorists based on "the unbridled discretion of the police officer" constitutes unreasonable restraint under the 4th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and every effort must be made to minimize the intrusion on personal rights.

Judge convicts extortionist of making false tax claims

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — James W. Lewis, convicted of trying to extort money from the maker of Extra-Strength Tylenol after seven deaths caused by poisoned capsules of the pain reliever, has been convicted of making a false claim to the Internal Revenue Service.

U.S. District Judge Ross T. Roberts found Lewis guilty Tuesday.

Lewis, who waived a jury trial and agreed to be tried by Roberts, faces a maximum of eight years in prison on the conviction.

Authorities accused Lewis of taking a $2,500 check made out to the IRS by a client of his accounting service and directed the IRS to credit the tax account of a phony business he set up. Lewis later filed a tax return for the business, in which he claimed a tax refund of $2,243, authorities said.

Lewis, 37, was convicted in Chicago last October of trying to extort $1 million from Johnson & Johnson by writing a letter after seven people died in the Chicago area from swallowing Tylenol capsules filled with cyanide. No one ever has been charged with the actual poisonings.

CU dumps K-State with scoring burst

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

The Colorado Buffaloes used a scoring outburst midway through the second half to down K-State 74-66 last night in Boulder.

The Buffaloes, now 1-3 in Big Eight Conference play, were down 48-47 with 8:30 remaining when they outscored the 'Cats 16-2 in a five-minute span to take a commanding 63-52 lead. The Colorado outburst broke open a game K-State, now 0-3 in the conference, had led for much of the contest.

Four Colorado players, led by senior center Randy Downs with 17 points, scored in double figures. Forward Vince Kelley added 12 points, seven coming in the decisive Colorado scoring run, while junior forward Alex Stivrins added 13 and sophomore Mike Reid scored 11 for the Buffaloes.

K-State sophomore Ben Mitchell came off the bench to tally 19 points, while junior Eddie Elder was the only other 'Cat in double figures, adding 10.

Starting the game, the 'Cats looked ready to win their first conference game of the season. K-State ran off eight unanswered points, until Colorado got on the scoreboard after nearly five minutes of play. With a jumper by junior Tom Alfaro, the 'Cats ran up their biggest lead of the game, 18-8, with 8:30 remaining in the opening half.

Colorado fought back, forcing the 'Cats into four straight turnovers to pull within two, 22-20. With two minutes left in the opening half, Mitchell scored off a pass from junior forward Lafayette Watkins, was fouled and added a free throw to give the 'Cats a 25-20 lead. K-State went into the locker room with a 27-24 halftime lead.

Colorado tied the game, 27-27, at the start of the second half on a free throw by senior guard Jay Humphries and a basket by Downs. A score by Kelley gave the Buffs their first lead of the contest with 17:52 remaining, 29-27.

The two teams traded baskets until junior guard Eric Watson scored to give the 'Cats a 35-34 lead with 15:30 left. A breakaway layup by sophomore guard Jonas Cody gave the 'Cats their biggest lead of the second half, 41-37.

K-State kept the lead until a hook shot by Downs put Colorado on top, 47-46. A Cody free throw tied the game, but his point along with a Mitchell basket, were all the points K-State could manage over the next five minutes.

A tip in by Stivrins opened the Colorado run. Kelley added two baskets and a free throw to push the Buffalo lead to 53-48. After Mitchell's score, Tony Pruitt added two baskets to increase the Colorado lead. Two free throws pushed Colorado's advantage to 61-50, with 4:03 left.

K-State made a comeback attempt in the last three minutes. With Colorado ahead 65-52, the 'Cats hit six points in a row and, with Cody at the free throw line, had a chance to pull within six. The 6-foot-0 guard missed his shot and the Buffaloes pushed their lead back to 11 with two quick baskets and held on for the 74-66 victory.

The 'Cats will try to pick up their first conference win of the year Saturday, traveling to Lawrence to face the University of Kansas. The Jayhawks will go into the game sharing the Big Eight lead with the University of Oklahoma. Both squads have 3-1 conference marks.

K-State's next home contest is Feb. 1 against the Iowa State Cyclones.

Jones leads Lady 'Cats to win over Colorado

Jennifer Jones and the free-throw line spelled victory for the Lady 'Cats basketball squad as it defeated the University of Colorado Lady Buffs, 77-55, at Boulder last night.

Jones had a shining performance, hitting nine of 11 field goals and five of six free throws to lead all scorers with her career-high 23 points. The 'Cats were also aided by another 23-point performance — this one coming from the charity stripe — as K-State went to the line a whopping 34 times as compared to only 10 times for Colorado. The Buffs connected on five of those attempts.

Sophomore Cassandra Jones and senior Angie Bonner also got into the double-figure scoring act for K-State, with Jones scoring 13 points and Bonner adding 11. Bonner and sophomore Sheronda Jenkins shared top rebounding honors, each pulling down six boards.

Early defensive pressure was the key to victory, said Head Coach Lynn Hickey, whose 'Cats stormed out to 38-25 halftime lead. Each Lady 'Cat saw playing time as the squad pulled away for the 22-point victory.

"Defense was the key early," Hickey said. "It was a great defensive effort and a good team effort."

"Everyone got a chance to play, and I'm glad this one's over," continued Hickey, who remembered

Colorado's 84-67 upset over the 'Cats last season.

Jennifer Jones' 23 points bettered her recent performance against the University of Oklahoma, Jan. 21, when she connected on seven of 13 field goals and two of two free throws for 16 points. Her previous career high was 20.

K-State, now 13-3 overall and 3-0 in Big Eight Conference play, next faces the University of Kansas Jayhawks Jan. 28 at Lawrence.

Sophomore Tina Dixon, who has yet to see Big Eight action because of a knee injury, should be ready for Saturday's contest with Kansas. Dixon is the 'Cats leading scorer, with a 13.8 average per game, and also leads the squad with 7.7 rebounds per contest.

Dixon also leads the Big Eight and is third in the nation in field goal percentage, connecting on 69 percent of her attempts. She is ninth in the Big Eight in rebounding, third in blocked shots and 11th in individual scoring. She scored a career-high 35 points in the 'Cats 82-78 loss to the University of Texas.

Kansas, 5-9 overall and 1-1 in the conference pending results of a game against the University of Nebraska, will be led by senior Angie Snider, a 5-foot-10 forward averaging 24 points per game.

Perez may be charged ABC pays record price to broadcast Olympics

By The Associated Press

SANTIAGO, Dominican Republic — Atlanta Braves pitcher Pascual Perez can be charged with a criminal violation of drug laws, a judge ruled Wednesday. If found guilty, he could face two to five years in prison.

District Attorney Luis Coss said that Judge Fortuna Garcia, in handing down the decision, had given him five days to determine exact charges to be filed against Perez. Coss said the possible charges include possession and distribution of cocaine. Although Perez admitted to having a half-gram of the drug in his wallet at the time of his arrest Jan. 10, he reportedly was not actually attempting to distribute it.

He can, however, be charged with distribution based on the quantity of the drug confiscated by authorities, Coss said.

Coss said a trial date will be announced early next week. Perez will be brought before a criminal court judge for a non-jury trial.

If found guilty, the 24-year-old right-hander could be sentenced to a two-to-five year jail term and fined $2,000 to $5,000.

Perez, who had a 15-8 record for the Braves as a starter last season, has said he was given the substance in Atlanta on Jan. 9 by an unidentified woman, and did not know it was cocaine.

He had been in Atlanta for contract negotiations with the Braves. Authorities arrested him Jan. 10 in front of a bar in Santiago, and he has been in jail since.

The pitcher was denied bail because of his past record. He was arrested on a drug violation in 1982 and released after being fined and warned.

Perez also was jailed for 11 days in February last year when several rounds of ammunition were found in his car. He reported late to last year's Braves spring training camp because of the problem.

During the off season, Perez was pitching for the Cibao Eagles in the Dominican Winter Baseball League and had a 4-1 record.

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — ABC has purchased broadcast rights to the 1988 Winter Olympics for a record $309 million — nearly $100 million more than it paid for this year's Summer Games. But there's speculation in broadcasting circles that the 1988 Games in Calgary may be the last shown exclusively on free television.

The Calgary Olympic Organizing Committee made the announcement Tuesday in Lausanne, Switzerland, site of negotiations with the U.S. television networks.

ABC will be covering its 10th Games in the last 13 Olympics, missing out only on the U.S.-boycotted 1980 Summer Games from Moscow, the 1972 Winter Games and the 1964 Summer Games.

A network source said ABC won a bidding war with NBC. CBS had dropped out, but NBC was ready to pay $300 million. The winning bid — not including production, planning and personnel costs — was the highest in Olympic history, surpassing the $225 million ABC is paying for the Los Angeles Games this summer.

Exclusive U.S. broadcast rights for next month's Winter Games in Sarajevo cost ABC $91.5 million.

There's already talk that the 1988 Summer Games, from Seoul, Korea, are being shopped at $1 billion. But, Joel Segal, a senior vice president at Ted Bates advertising agency, called that price "ridiculous. Nobody is going to pay it."

Segal said the possibility of pay television getting a piece of the 1988 Summer Games is growing.

Seoul has disadvantages which could make the 1988 Summer Games too big a gamble for one network to do alone.

First, Seoul is 13 hours ahead of New York time, making the broadcast of live events difficult. Second, some network officials are uncertain whether Seoul has the technological capabilities to accommodate American television needs.

A booklet published by the Seoul Olympic Organizing Committee says the Summer Games are tentatively scheduled for Sept. 20-Oct. 5, described as the "best part of Korea's autumn."

Those "Autumn Games" could be more attractive to the networks because more viewers are home after summer vacations, and the Games could be used to promote a network's new prime-time season.

Segal said the network could try to recoup its costs by raising advertising rates or by carrying more coverage — which means more commercial breaks.

He expected some advertisers to balk at the rising costs, but "there are certain advertisers who will pay any increase," he said.

K-State track teams to travel to Missouri for competition

The K-State men's and women's track teams will travel to Columbia, Mo., Saturday for the Missouri men's triangular and women's quadrangular. The Wildcat men will compete against Kansas and Missouri, while the women match up with Kansas, Missouri and Illinois State.

"Because we will be going head to head with Big Eight teams, this meet will be very important to us because it will allow us to see where we stand," said Steve Miller, K-State head track coach.

The Jayhawks are strong in the middle distance areas. Jim Metzger, who recently pole vaulted 17-foot-2 inches, is one of the conferences better pole-vaulters.

Missouri, Miller said, has "some of the best athletes in the conference, nation and even the world."

Miller referred to Yussel Ali and Chidi Imoh. Representing Nigeria in the World University Games this summer, both men were champions — Ali in the long jump and Imoh in the 100-meter dash.

The Wildcats' women's team is strong in individuals, but lacks good depth. Despite a lack of depth, Miller said he feels the team can repeat last year's first-place finish.

"It should be an exciting meet. I expect to be first or second in the women's and men's divisions, and I really feel that we can win both," he said.

The track teams recently returned from the Kansas All-Corners meet in Lawrence, where Pinkie Suggs tossed the shot put 49-5½ to set a K-State women's record. Suggs owned the old mark with a throw of 48-1½ last year.

Argovitz denies misrepresenting Sims

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Jerry Argovitz, co-owner of the Houston Gamblers and former agent of Billy Sims, denied under oath Wednesday he misled Sims in contract talks with both the Gamblers and the Detroit Lions.

The testimony came at the beginning of a trial before U.S. District Judge Robert E. DeMascio in a suit filed against Argovitz and the United States Football League expansion team.

"If I'm dealing with someone being devious and I know what their story is beforehand, I tape record them," Argovitz replied to a question from Sims' lawyer, Elbert Hatchett.

However, he said he did not tape his talks with attorney Fred Nash of the Lions because he felt the lawyer has "superlative character."

Argovitz also said he could not produce a copy of a management contract he held with Sims when the running back signed with Houston.

Hatchett asked Argovitz if he considered himself a "paranoid and suspicious type person" and if the tendency to record business dealings would have made him more likely to keep better records of contract talks with the Lions.

"I wouldn't describe it that way," Argovitz responded.

Sims signed a $3.5 million contract with Houston last July 1, an undated agreement Nov. 12 and received $197,608 in July as part of a $1 million signing bonus, the Gamblers said. He also signed a $5 million contract with the Lions on Dec. 16.

The Gamblers contend their contract is valid, and the team won the rights to Sims' services fairly.

At issue is whether the 28-year-old Sims will continue to play for the Lions of the National Football League or switch to the Gamblers of the United States Football League.

Sims has signed contracts with both teams and the trial, expected to last about a week, will determine which of the two contracts the 1978 Heisman Trophy winner should honor. Sims said he prefers to stay with the Lions, which offered him more money.

Sims' lawyer, Elbert Hatchett, accused Argovitz of misrepresentation because he kept acting as Sims' agent even after he became co-owner of the Gamblers. Argovitz and his partners became owners of the Gamblers' franchise in early May.

On June 22, according to testimony, Argovitz told Sims — who was about to enter the option year of the original three-year contract he signed with Detroit after coming out of Oklahoma as the No. 1 pick in the NFL draft — that the Lions were dragging their feet.

Hatchett said Argovitz' pre-trial deposition indicated, however, that he knew a $3.5 million offer was coming from the Lions and that he failed to inform Sims.

A week after Sims secretly signed with the Gamblers, the Lions made Sims a better offer — but without guarantees. Sims, after hearing of the proposal by telephone from Argovitz, turned the offer down.

The Lions were so surprised that owner William Clay Ford — who seldom gets involved in team operations — urged Sims to get a copy of the offer, according to testimony. Sims disregarded the advice, according to opening statements by Houston lawyer Steve Susman.

The Lions contend Sims turned down the offer because Argovitz never explained it to him.

"I withheld no information from Billy Sims," Argovitz said. "I was always open and above board."

"I told Billy he was free to get another agent anytime he wanted," Argovitz said. "I've always tried to do my best in Billy's behalf."

Sims filed a separate suit Jan. 9, seeking $775,000 in damages from Argovitz to recover $175,000 he paid his former agent for handling the Houston contract. He also sought $600,000 in damages, claiming Argovitz failed to negotiate the option year of his contract with Detroit.

"That strikes me as a conflict of interest, delivering a player to the team you own and then taking a fee on top of it," Hatchett said.

If DeMascio upholds the Lions' contract with Sims, there may be a separate trial to determine whether the Gamblers and Argovitz owe the Lions damages.

DeMascio ruled Monday that the Lions have no standing in the case, but their attorneys sat at the counsel table with Hatchett.

Players meet deadline in baseball arbitration

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — American League Cy Young winner LaMarr Hoyt of the Chicago White Sox and AL batting champion Wade Boggs of Boston were among several big-name players who beat the midnight Wednesday deadline for filing for salary arbitration, the players' union said.

Also filing for arbitration was relief pitcher Steve Howe of the Los Angeles Dodgers, banned by Commissioner Bowie Kuhn from playing in 1984 for his admitted involvement with drugs. Howe lost his arbitration case in 1983, asking for $450,000, but receiving $325,000.

Hoyt, the right-hander who compiled a 24-10 record as the White Sox won the AL West in 1983, will be joined in arbitration by teammates Kevin Hickey, Steve Mura, Rudy Law and, probably, Rich Dotson.

Dotson, 22-7 in 1983, had not filed by Wednesday, but sources close to the club said he would join Hoyt in asking an impartial arbitrator to decide his salary squabble with the White Sox.

Hoyt and Dotson were the two lowest paid members of the White Sox's four-man starting rotation last year. Hoyt made a reported $275,000 plus a $50,000 bonus for winning the Cy Young Award, while Dotson earned $340,000. Britt Burns made $750,000, while Floyd Bannister was the highest-paid member of the staff, making an average $925,000 over the seven years of his contract.

Sources said both Hoyt and Dotson would ask for $750,000 to $800,000, while the White Sox were expected to come in at about $500,000.

"Obviously, this will be high-tone arbitration," said White Sox co-owner Jerry Reinsdorf.

Boggs, who batted .361 for the Red Sox in 1983, also filed along with such name players as infielder Johnny Ray of Pittsburgh, first baseman Kent Hrbek of Minnesota, relief pitcher Lee Smith of the Chicago Cubs and Jesse Orosco of the New York Mets, and third baseman Pedro Guerrero of the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Under salary arbitration, players and clubs each submit a proposed salary figure to an arbitrator. After hearing arguments, the arbitrator must select one of the two figures, which is binding. No compromising is allowed. A player must have two years of major league service before he is eligible to file for arbitration.

The date of the arbitration hearing is mutually agreed upon by player and club, but it must fall between Feb. 1-20. Clubs are free to negotiate with, and may sign, players up until their hearing.

All contracts settled in arbitration are for one year, however, and that's why another Dodger, pitcher Fernando Valenzuela, also is eligible. The Dodgers offered Valenzuela $750,000 last year in arbitration; he asked for $1 million and won.

'Skins quarterback optimistic

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — When Joe Theismann walked off the field last Sunday, his head was bowed and there was no hint of the characteristic spring in his step. He looked like a 34-year-old quarterback who, along with his team, had just taken a beating.

But three days later, he was the Joe Theismann of old...friendly, talkative and entirely self-assured.

Although obviously disappointed by the Redskins' dismal showing in the 38-9 Super Bowl loss to the Los Angeles Raiders, the Redskins' quarterback had patched up his wounded optimism.

"I think one thing that will be very interesting to see is how everybody on the Redskins deals with the loss," Theismann, starting quarterback for the National Football Conference all-stars, said at a practice session for Sunday's Pro Bowl.

"It's the first time this group of men has been involved in a major setback, a major adverse situation. Some of us have dealt with a lot of different adverse conditions in our lives and came out of it, but it's the first time for this team," he said.

"I think it's going to make the Redskins a better football team in the long run...at least I sure hope so."

Theismann, one of the heroes of Washington's victory over Miami in the NFL championship game a year ago, had his problems in Super Bowl XVIII.

He completed 16 of 35 passes for 243 yards against the Raiders, but was intercepted twice and accounted for no points as the Redskins, the league's highest scoring team ever, were held to a lone touchdown.

Analyzing the game, he said it was simply a case of almost everything going wrong for the Redskins and almost everything going right for the Raiders.

"What I really found disappointing was that we are so very much better than our performance indicated," he said, a red scrape under his chin a memento of the six times the Raiders sacked him. "We just didn't play well enough in any facet of the game.

"We had a lot of things go wrong — that interception they made at the half, and, of course, that blocked punt they got a touchdown on at the start certainly didn't help.

"But I think the turning point of the game was at the start of the second half," Theismann said. "We managed to score the first time we got the ball (making it 21-9), but they came right back to score. That took a lot out of us.

"Everytime something started to happen for us, it suddenly would swing back their way."

Kansas grabs 77-61 victory over 'Huskers

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Carl Henry scored 23 points and led a Kansas rally in the second half as the Jayhawks defeated Nebraska 77-61 in Big Eight Conference basketball action last night.

The Huskers, behind the hot shooting of Stan Cloudy, fashioned a 38-34 halftime lead. But Henry, who had only eight points in the first half, combined with Greg Dreiling to put the Jayhawks in control midway through the second half.

The victory raised Kansas' overall record to 11-5 and its Big Eight mark to 3-1. Nebraska dropped to 11-5 and 1-2.

Dave Hoppen, Nebraska's 6-foot-11 sophomore center who has averaged almost 20 points per game, fouled out with 3:08 remaining after scoring 16 points.

Dreiling, the tallest starter in the conference at 7-foot-1, had 15 points for the Jayhawks.

A bucket by Henry with nine minutes left boosted Kansas to a 51-50 lead, and the Jayhawks never trailed again. Kelly Knight and Henry then hit buckets, and Dreiling completed a three-point play to give the Jayhawks a 58-50 lead with 7:04 left. Nebraska never got closer than five points.

Cloudy was eight for 10 from the field with 18 points in the first half, but scored only four points in the second half for a total of 22.

Attendance at games rises

The attendance for Big Eight Conference basketball games has been on the upswing since the start of league play, according to attendance figures released by the Big Eight office.

While Big Eight teams are drawing fans at an average of 8,795 per game overall, conference games have an average attendance of 11,401. Only at Oklahoma State University, where arena capacity is below 10,000, have fewer than 10,000 fans showed up for a single game.

While conference teams drew fans at about 68 percent capacity during the non-conference schedule, the figure is now up to nearly 73 percent and 94.4 percent for conference head-to-head meetings.

The University of Oklahoma is filling 92.3 percent of its arena capacity (10,871) to lead the Big Eight. Following Oklahoma, in order of percent of arena filled, are: Iowa State University, Oklahoma State, the University of Kansas, the University of Nebraska, K-State, the University of Colorado and the University of Missouri.

K-State's home court, Ahearn Field House, has a seating capacity of 11,220, and in nine home games the Wildcats have drawn an average of 7,272 fans per game — 64.8 percent of capacity.

Economy may cause enrollment slack

By The College Press Service

The silver cloud of the U.S. economic recovery may prove to have a dark lining for some colleges. Enrollment, some fear, might finally dip as precipitously as experts once predicted it would during the early 1980s.

"If the recovery continues," Lester Brookner, chief business officer at Miami-Dade Community College, said, "I'd anticipate a decrease in enrollment because profitably-employed people don't go to college as readily as they do during recessions."

"In times of recession, more people go back to school for additional training," M.J. Williams of the National Association of College and University Business Officers, said.

But now that the recession appears to be over and jobs gradually become more plentiful, people may not need re-training as much as in the past few years.

There are signs that an enrollment decline may be beginning in certain kinds of schools.

An "informal" two-year college fall enrollment survey by the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges (AACJC) shows a slight drop in the number of students attending classes full time, and an increase in the number of part-time students.

"Good economic times lead to an increase in the number of part-time students and a decrease in those attending school full time," James Gollattscheck of the AACJC, said.

"A lot of students who came here full-time are continuing school (part time) and are working," Brookner said.

The biggest impact, in fact, may be on community and junior colleges. Enrollment at "low price-tag" urban schools may be the most sensitive to changes in the local job market, Julianne Still-Thrift of the National Institute of Independent Colleges and Universities, said.

Otherwise, "when people are optimistic about the economy, they're more likely to make an investment in their children's education," she said. "Consequently, a good economy is good for us (four-year colleges)."

Nevertheless, colleges that rely primarily on 18-year-olds to fill their campuses also may be vulnerable.

Since the mid-70s, experts have been forecasting a sharp drop in college enrollments because of the declining numbers of 18-year-olds. Enrollments have continued to rise — to a record total of over 12 million over the last two years — due largely to increased recruiting of non-traditional students.

Non-traditional students are people older than the usual 18-to-24-year-old age group, and who may be returning to college for re-training. "It's obvious colleges must be doing a better recruiting job to fill themselves up with students," Williams said.

But if the economy continues to improve, fewer non-traditional students theoretically need to return to school.

State funding of colleges have increased this year. Total state appropriations to colleges are up 11 percent this year, G.F. Hudgens of the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges said.

The University of Cincinnati, for example, got 18.5 percent more in state funds this year, though "we're still playing catch-up" from years of funding cuts during the recession, Sigmund Ginsburg, the school's vice president for finance, said.

UC, moreover, still depends on the traditional-aged, full-time students for its tuition revenues, although Ohio is losing population of traditional-age students.

Others fear inflation might eat up any gains in state funding. If inflation this year goes up the four to five percent many economists predict, Hudgens said college administrators will have to defer much-needed facility improvements and maintenance projects.

But the overriding factor, given budget increases and an improving economy, on enrollment remains the demography of college-aged students, Gordon Johnson, budget officer at the University of Colorado, said.

"Even if we continue to get some share of the market (of non-traditional and non-resident students)," he said, "we're still on a decline because there are fewer 18-year-olds around to re-populate freshman classes."

Hearings investigate speed of evacuation

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — Evacuation of the 10-mile area around the Wolf Creek nuclear power plant in the event of an emergency could be completed in 2½ hours, a witness for Kansas Gas and Electric Co. testified Wednesday.

Michael E. Stern testified at a hearing of the Atomic Safety and Licensing Board of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission that the general population of the area around the plant could be evacuated in about one hour and 12 minutes.

Evacuation of the area's special population — residents of nursing homes, hospital patients, children in schools and day-care centers and others who would need help — would take about 2½ hours, Stern said.

Stern said Coffey County officials have estimated that 102 people would need assistance in an evacuation.

"The resources are much larger than the numbers we're talking about here...You have an extremely strong road system for the population of the county for the evacuation of the people," Stern testified.

Stern, a vice president of Phoenix Power Services in McLean, Va., has assisted KG&E in emergency planning for the past three years.

His testimony came on the eighth day of hearings by the board to gather evidence concerning emergency response and evacuation plans for the Wolf Creek station, which is under construction near Burlington, KG&E, Kansas City Power and Light Co. and the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc. are building the $2.67 billion plant, which is scheduled to start operating in the spring of 1985.

The hearings were scheduled after the Wolf Creek license application was challenged by two women who live within 10 miles of the plant. Wanda Christy and Mary Ellen Salava contend that emergency plans are inadequate.

Stern said Wednesday that the estimate of one hour and 12 minutes for evacuation of the general population is based on a common assumption that the average time for individuals to prepare to leave their homes is 30 minutes and an average speed of 20 miles an hour on designated evacuation routes.

He said evacuation routes have been designated to provide "a smooth flow of traffic" and to direct people to registration centers in host counties. But other routes could be used and the evacuation would be as efficient, he said.

The normal road capacity presented in guidance material from the NRC is 850 vehicles per hour. By contrast, Stern said, the access road to the Wolf Creek plant at the end of a work day now carries more than 1,950 vehicles per hour.

Marcos' government blames priests for deaths

By The Associated Press

BACOLOD, Philippines — A conflict between the Roman Catholic Church and the government of President Ferdinand E. Marcos has developed on the verdant, sugar-growing island of Negros where three priests and six lay workers have been charged with murder.

The case against the three priests — Brian Gore of Perth, Australia; Niall O'Brien of Dublin, Ireland, and Vicente Dangan, a Filipino — has focused attention on Negros, a central Philippine island where thousands of poor workers live in makeshift shacks amid vast haciendas run by some of the country's richest families. The gap between poor and rich has led to violence and a growing Communist rebellion in recent years.

The priests and lay workers say they were framed for the 1982 ambush murder of Kabankalan mayor Pablo Sola and four of his aides. Sola himself had been charged with murdering seven sugar workers whose bodies were found buried near his hacienda in 1980.

The priests were placed under house arrest by Marcos one day after they were jailed last May. On Jan. 5, they asked to join the lay workers who have remained in a squalid and crowded provincial jail for more than eight months.

The area's provincial commander, Col. Francisco Agudon, refused to jail the priests, even after a judge denied bail Tuesday to all but Dangan who refused to post it. "They're my guests," said Agudon, 56, who described his relations with the church as cordial. He denied allegations the military has been harassing church workers.

"How could I harass the church when I am a Catholic myself?" he asked.

But the priests say the charges are rooted in their efforts to build communities where people can improve their lives and defend their rights against the planters and the military.

"The...charge is a frame-up and is the work of sick minds in the military establishment obsessed with waging a hate campaign against the religious and other religious workers who are working for the poor," they said in a court petition denying the charges of murder, inciting rebellion and possession of deadly weapons.

Negros Archbishop Antonio Fortich said community efforts have continued in other villages despite the arrests.

Fortich has spoken at rallies and said he knows the churchmen are innocent, but he added in an interview, "I don't want to rock the boat. We have the courts."

He had protested an eight-month delay in the decision to deny bail and said he doesn't believe Marcos can afford to let the case drag on with a National Assembly election in May.

A church source in Manila said the foreign priests were offered deportation but Fortich angrily rejected it on their behalf, saying they had a right to have their names cleared. Gore has worked in the Philippines 14 years and O'Brien 19 years. Both say they want to stay.

The lay workers say the government has treated them worse than it has the foreign priests.

"We were building a Christian community, and opinion is that is why there was plenty of harassment by the military in the community," said one of the laymen, 36-year-old Conrado Mual who was interviewed at the jail.

Officials have allowed foreign and local reporters access to the priests and lay workers. An Australian television crew even filmed inside the workers' blackened 10-by-20-foot cell.

The case has brought protests from Australian politicians, and Australian Ambassador Roy Fernandez has acknowledged it could hinder approval of aid from his country to the Philippines.

O'Brien's mother, Irish church leaders and human rights workers have visited the priests and lay workers.

But one prominent local sugar planter, Eduardo Claparols, criticized the foreign attention given the case, calling it "high and mighty atmospherics."

Mahaffey's attorney asks committee to judge data quality

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor
and SUZANNE LARKIN
Staff Writer

Ben Mahaffey was like "a chicken with a defect, and the other chickens in the lot pecked him to death," David Schauner, Mahaffey's attorney, said today in his opening statements.

Allowing the University to first present its case, Schauner gave his opening statement and challenged the way in which the Department of Forestry faculty members placed all of the blame for the department's conflicts on Mahaffey. A petition which was signed by 21 department faculty members was done so with the faculty only having second-hand knowledge of Mahaffey's actions, he said.

Blame for the department's conflicts cannot all be leveled at Mahaffey, Schauner said, and "every player in the drama has some percentage of the fault."

Schauner told the six-member faculty committee that "quantity is not the measure by which the committee ought to make a decision, but quality of data." The University called 19 witnesses in its case, which was interrupted six times to allow testimony by witnesses for Mahaffey.

The forestry department was formed in 1977, combining state extension foresters and faculty previously in the Department of Horticulture and Forestry. Schauner said the departmental conflict which centers on Mahaffey began about that time because the extension foresters did not know how to accommodate the teaching faculty.

"Mahaffey was a stranger in a strange land," he said.

Yet this stranger, according to Orville

Bidwell, professor of agronomy, played a crucial role in the success of the natural resource management curriculum.

"Ben is valuable to the College of Agriculture. He is a demanding instructor who brings out the best in his students. We were co-advisers of the Natural Resource Management Club and without Ben, a great deal of enthusiasm would have been lost. He played a crucial role in the club's success. I have great faith in Dr. Mahaffey," Bidwell said.

Becky Crow, fifth year senior in elementary education, who received a degree in natural resource management last year, was more adamant in regards to Mahaffey. Crow was a University witness and Mahaffey's case was interrupted Thursday afternoon for her testimony.

"He asked me if I liked him. I told him that I didn't like him or care for the way he ran his class," she said.

Crow, who has taken two classes from Mahaffey, said she didn't have any problems in the first class, but ended up dropping the second.

"Initially there were no problems, but when I took my second class with Mahaffey, there were."

"I could sense tension in the department, the tension between Mahaffey and (Harold) Gallaher (former head of the forestry department). When problems started, Mahaffey brought the problems to class with him. He never really came out and stated his opinions though," she said.

Crow claimed Mahaffey manipulated and exploited his students.

"We used to receive handouts and have to memorize them for a test. He used to manipulate us with these handouts, he didn't let us use our own minds to interpret what others said. He always wanted us to think his way, and if we didn't, we were wrong."

"I also believe he exploited students. He was always saying that the most valuable resource you had was another person, but he always believed he was right, and no one else," Crow said.

Also testifying for Mahaffey Thursday were Sherri and Robin Ladner, who both received degrees in park and recreational management.

In reference to Mahaffey's reported sexist attitude, Robin Ladner said Mahaffey occasionally said a "woman's place is in the home," but only to stimulate conversation, he said.

The hearing is expected to end today with Mahaffey taking the stand. The hearing is in Union Room 212 and is open to the public.

Leftists kill American in El Salvador

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Leftist rebels shot and killed an American woman who was traveling with her family Thursday on the Pan American Highway in eastern El Salvador, a military official said.

He said the woman, Linda L. Cancel, her husband and two children, ages 5 and 1, were driving toward Honduras when they ignored an order by rebels to stop near the town of Jocoro in the northeast province of Morazan.

The official said Mrs. Cancel's husband, whose name was not released, was driving a white Chevrolet minibus with Alabama license plates. He said the family planned to go to Costa Rica, but the purpose of the trip was not disclosed.

A customs official was in the car with the family, as is the practice when foreign travelers are heading for the border, said the official, who asked not to be identified for security reasons.

Cancel, who was driving, did not stop when ordered to do so by the rebels because the customs man was in the car, the official said. A bullet hit Mrs. Cancel in the chest and exited through her back, he said.

A U.S. Embassy official gave no information, except to say that an American who was not a member of the embassy staff was killed.

The first report of Mrs. Cancel's death came from a Roman Catholic priest who said he administered the last rites and the shooting occurred El Divisadero and Santa Rosa de Lima, about 127 miles east of San Salvador.

The priest, who spoke in a telephone interview from Santa Rosa de Lima and asked not to be named, said he also saw the body of a Salvadoran.

"Apparently when they passed the junction at Sociedad, on the military road, they were attacked — apparently by terrorists. That is what they (the customs officials) told us and they told us that someone was killed."

"After the attack, they rushed to El Amatillo (on the Honduran border) and they stopped there because of the situation," the priest said. "When I arrived to attend her she was dead. She was an American."

He said "an air force helicopter was also in El Amatillo," presumably to pick up the body and take the family to San Salvador or elsewhere for safety.

Mobile home

A workman for Bittersweet Enterprises stands atop a house owned by Burr Electric as it is moved along North Manhattan Avenue Thursday afternoon. The house was being moved from 1850 Anderson Ave. to the 800 block of Pottawatomie Avenue. The move began about 9 a.m. and passed through campus during the noon hour.

Reagan completes first political campaign trip

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — President Reagan, testing re-election themes on his first paid political outing of the 1984 campaign season, declared Thursday that "we've come too far, struggled too hard, and accomplished too much to turn back now."

The quick, two-speech trip to Atlanta — about six hours including flying time — was the first one paid for by the Reagan-Bush '84 re-election campaign committee and came three days in advance of Reagan's formal, televised declaration of his political plans for 1984.

The first appearance, at a rally put on by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Amway Corp., was billed by the sponsors as non-partisan because the chamber does not endorse candidates.

In the prepared part of his speech, Reagan said, "Together, we have charted a new course since 1980. And because we took those bold steps, I believe America is stronger, more prosperous and more secure today than three years ago."

He was interrupted by applause 42 times, including five standing ovations, during the first speech.

But he saved his most overtly political remarks for a session an hour later with the Southern Republican Leadership Conference, which included GOP officeholders, candidates, and activists from 14 Southern states.

The Republican leaders greeted Reagan with the chant, "Four More in '84."

"I'll take that under consideration," said Reagan, using the occasion to poke fun at the eight-man Democratic field and their recent televised debate in New Hampshire.

"There were so many candidates on the platform there were not enough promises to go around," he said.

Before Reagan's arrival in downtown Atlanta, 120 demonstrators stood near the Omni Hotel, where Reagan was to speak to the southern Republican leaders. The demonstrators carried signs which said such things as "Get Out Of Grenada, Central America, Lebanon" and "Feed the Jobless, Not the Pentagon."

"We want to send a message to the president and Mr. (Edwin) Meese that there are hungry people out here who need help," said Southern Christian Leadership Conference spokesman Albert E. Love.

Shortly after he left the site of the first speech, a banner that read "Reaganism means racism, sexism and war" was unfurled.

Kennedy lecture schedule omits meeting, conference

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., is scheduled to arrive at Manhattan Municipal Airport just before his Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. Monday in McCain Auditorium, said William Richter, the lecture series' director.

"There won't be an opportunity for a group meeting," Richter, professor of political science, said. "Anyone who tried to do that would probably end up missing the speech."

No topic has been announced for the senator's speech. No press conference has been scheduled, but a question and answer period is expected to follow the address if time permits.

Kennedy's lecture is the first of three scheduled this semester. Hudding Carter III, former State Department spokesman and Public Broadcasting Service personality, is to speak Feb. 13, and Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley will visit April 16.

Those wishing to listen to the address may do so in the Union at the Forum Hall, Little Theater, first floor lounge and the recreation area. Local radio stations KSAC and KMAN also will carry the speech, as will cable Channel 6.

Landon Lectures, which are free and open to the public, honor former Kansas governor Alfred M. Landon.

Protesters have disrupted past lectures. Richter said he hopes that will not happen this semester.

"We have not heard from any protest groups," Richter said. "In the past, we have contacted groups and made arrangements to protect their rights and ours."

Richter said there would be space designated near McCain for those wishing to protest and urged protest groups to contact him before the speech. Although different arrangements could be made, the designated area probably won't be in view of Kennedy, he said.

Kennedy is scheduled to leave Manhattan immediately after a luncheon with Landon Lecture patrons.

Carlin to lead observance of Kansas' 123rd birthday

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin, a Democrat, will lead Kansas Day observance at the Capitol today, while Kansas Republicans gather at a downtown hotel for their big annual blowout marking the state's entry into the Union in 1861.

Carlin speaks at mid-morning during a program of music featuring the Kansas State University men's glee club and local school groups. Carlin will cut and serve cake for those who attend the rotunda observance, which will include displays of state art and artifacts.

While the state's birthday actually is Sunday, most activities will be today and Saturday — highlighted by U.S. Sen. Nancy Kassebaum's address to a joint session of the Legislature at 11 a.m. today, the annual Native Sons and Daughters dinner tonight and the Republicans' annual Kansas Day dinner Saturday night.

Sen. Kassebaum's appearance follows a similar speech last year by Sen. Bob Dole. Kassebaum has said she will seek Republican renomination and re-election this year, but will not formally announce until late March.

Dole also will attend the Kansas Day activities, conducting a news conference at 4 p.m. Saturday with U.S. Sen. Dave Durenberger of Minnesota, the speaker for the Kansas Day dinner Saturday night.

The Student Body President candidates are: Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communications; Ken Heinz, sophomore in computer science; Bruce Jacks, junior in engineering technology; Kent Jaecke, junior in animal science and industry; Eliezer Rodriguez, sophomore in pre law; and Tracy Turner, junior in economics.

In the Board of Student Publications race, six candidates are competing for four positions; 14 for six senate positions in the College of Agriculture; three for three in the College of Architecture and Design; 22 for 14 in the College of Arts and Sciences; 16 for eight in the College of Business Administration; three for three in the College of Education; 13 for nine in the College of Engineering; four for three in the College of Home Economics; one for one in the College of Veterinary Medicine; and seven for four in Graduate School.

Soviet Union increases Cuban military power

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union has increased the size of Cuba's navy and MiG-23 fighter force for the first time in several years, U.S. intelligence sources said Thursday.

A 2,300-ton Soviet-built frigate and a 2,100-ton diesel-powered submarine were delivered in recent days in Havana, said the sources, who spoke only on condition they remain anonymous.

In addition, the sources said crates believed to contain fuselages of three new MiG-23 Flogger jet fighters were seen early this month at an airfield southwest of Havana.

These planes are the first of their type sent by the Soviets to Cuba since 1982 and will bring to about 35 the number of these modern fighters in the Cuban air force, the sources said.

The Koni-class frigate is the second such warship provided by the Soviet Union for Cuba's growing navy. The first Koni frigate joined the Cuba fleet in August, 1981.

The additional Foxtrot submarine is the third vessel of that class provided by the Soviet Union to Cuba. The two earlier attack subs arrived in Cuba in 1979 and 1980.

The Cuban navy totals about 125 ships, mostly missile-armed attack boats, torpedo boats and patrol ships.

Although the Cuban navy is tiny when compared with that of the United States, it is the largest of any owned by nations in the Caribbean area. A number of small Caribbean island states have expressed concern about expanding Cuban naval and air power.

UFM announces lecture speakers

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum will be coming to Manhattan Feb. 14 to be the first speaker in the 1984 Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Kassebaum is a Republican who serves on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and has been vocal on human rights issues in Central America. Kassebaum headed the official U.S. Delegation to monitor the elections in El Salvador in 1982.

Four speakers are slated to participate in the 1984 Lou Douglas Lecture Series, an annual series of public forums sponsored by the University for Man. The series, now in its fifth year, is a tribute to the late Louis Douglas, former professor of political science at K-State.

This year's lecture series will focus on the theme: "1984: The Americans in Crisis."

The second speaker will be Efrain Diaz, representative to the Honduran Congress, member of the Christian Democratic Party of Honduras and K-State graduate. Diaz will speak March 5.

Bill Buzenberg, National Public Radio's correspondent in Latin America and K-State graduate, will speak on March 20. Joseph Collins, researcher and spokesman on world hunger and third-world development issues, co-founder of The Institute for Food and Development Policy and author of "What a Difference Could a Revolution Make? Food and Farming in the New Nicaragua" will speak on April 3.

Truman Scholar nominees chosen

Virgil Wiebe, sophomore in political science, and Cindy Leighton, sophomore in history, have been nominated for Truman Scholarships. The two K-State students were recently notified they are finalists and are eligible to go to Kansas City March 5 to interview for a possible $20,000 Truman Scholarship.

They will compete against others from this region, including Kansas, Missouri and Nebraska. Out of a group of up to 10 finalists, two will be chosen to be Truman Scholars.

K-State has had two Truman Scholarship winners — the maximum number allowed from a state each year — in each of the past two years. The only other universities to accomplish this are Harvard and Yale. This program is the largest undergraduate scholarship program in the nation.

Meat processors to discuss future

People from industry will join researchers to look toward the future at the 13th Annual Midwest Meat Processors Seminar.

The seminar, sponsored by the K-State Cooperative Extension Service and the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, begins at 8 a.m. Saturday.

Speakers include Dennis Buege, extension meats specialist at the University of Wisconsin, who will present information on cured meats and fermented summer sausage, and Jim Klema, of Klema Food Locker, who will discuss processed meat product development and marketing.

Senate kills button bill, supports identification

By PAUL ENGLIS
Collegian Reporter

The button lives.

Last night, Student Senate defeated a bill which would have repealed a previous bill requiring senators to wear an identification button on the day of senate meetings. The defeat came on a roll call vote of 33-22 with one abstention.

The original bill stated the button was intended to make senators more visible to the student body.

The main objection made by sponsors of the repeal was that they didn't think the button was effective in stimulating communication between senators and students.

Diane Johnson, engineering

senator, said senators could not be sure the button was the reason they had received favorable communication from the students. The button also tended to make students feel the senators were "stuck-up," she said.

Although the button has its drawbacks, some attempt at communicating with the student body is better than none, Kendra Ponte, arts and sciences senator, said.

"I can't help but feel that we proved last week (during the bill's first reading) that more senators had favorable response (to the button) than senators who had unfavorable response. Any type of communication is better than none," Ponte said.

While the main issue was whether senators should be required to wear the identification button, much debate centered around making a decision on the issue.

Jeff Gates, business senator, moved to table the bill.

"It all seems a little ridiculous to me. I just don't think it is worthy of our time, that's why I moved that we not even consider it," Gates said.

In addition to citing that the button was ineffective in stimulating communication, sponsors of the repeal objected to the fact that some senators did not wear their button as required.

"If a law is on the books and it is not being enforced then, one of two things must be done," said Brian O'Neill, graduate senator and one of the bill's sponsors. "Either the law must be eliminated or steps must be taken to ensure its enforcement."

In other business, senators approved appointments to the 1984 Summer School Allocations Board and the Nichols Hall Art Committee. Senators also approved the Arts and Sciences Constitutional Revisions.

The major change brought about by the revision is to move Arts and Sciences Council elections from September to one week after the SGA general elections, which are held the Wednesday of the fourth week of classes each spring.

Mark Tallman, Associated Students of Kansas executive director, answered questions during open period about ASK's stand on upcoming bills in the Kansas Legislature.

Firm's survey ranks accounting department 13th in nation

By LILLIAN ZIER
Collegian Reporter

A survey released this month ranked the K-State Department of Accounting 13th in the nation.

Dr. Maurice Stark, head of the accounting department, said the survey was conducted by the CPA Personnel Report, a newsletter for certified public accountant firms. In the report, 25 top accounting firms were asked to list the five schools which produce their best accountants.

A point system, which ranged from five points for every first-place vote to one point for every fifth-place vote, was used to determine the best accounting programs in the country.

Survey results recorded the top five schools, in order of ranking, as the University of Illinois-Urbana-Champaign; University of Michigan-Ann Arbor; University of Texas-Austin; Michigan State University-East Lansing and Illinois State University-Normal.

"The fact we were mentioned in this survey is due to the quality of the faculty and the concern for the students," Stark said. "They (faculty) maintain contact not only with students, but with recruiters. We're available to go to lunch with them (recruiters) and show them around. This makes an impression. This isn't true of all schools.

"I find it significant that K-State is the only one of the departments in the Big Eight mentioned," Stark said. "Our department is relatively new. We're establishing a record very fast."

CPA Personnel Report also surveyed department chairmen at almost 400 colleges to find the five best undergraduate programs. Illinois State University, University of Michigan and University of Texas were again ranked in the top five.

K-State was not mentioned. Stark said this was because professors tend to rank the schools from which they received their doctorate degrees.

"We're more interested in what the firms have to say. They're the ones who will be hiring our graduates," Stark said.

Enrollment in accounting is down from about 240 last year to about 200 this year, Stark said. Enrollments vary according to job projections.

"It's (the job market) always good for good students," Stark said. "All of our students seem to find jobs. Their number of choices depends on GPA (grade point average)."

"Prospective employers look for a good GPA. More than that, though, they look for people who can sell the firm or get along well with other people."

"We turn out very good graduates," he said. "In 1981 and in 1983 we had two of the top 110 scores on CPA exams. That's out of some 60,000 (people who took the test)."

K-State will soon expand the accounting department with the addition of about $100,000 worth of computer equipment which will be used to set up a microcomputer lab.

About half the money came from donations and the rest was state-funded, Stark said.

"We also have revised the curriculum to be sure it meets accreditation requirements," he said.

The department also has a Master of Accountancy Program that many schools do not have.

"There is a movement nationally to require five years of education to take a CPA exam," Stark said. "The Master of Accountancy Program puts us in a good position to meet this demand. The program now has about 15 students."

Committee hears views on domestic violence

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Douglas County District Attorney Jerry Harper and officials of the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services said Thursday the state should provide funding to establish more shelters in Kansas for victims of domestic violence, especially battered wives.

"It's a terrible problem, and we've got to do something about it," Harper told the Senate Judiciary Committee, which began four days of hearings on domestic violence and child abuse. The hearings continue today, Monday and Tuesday.

Harper testified after the committee heard a moving account by an Osage County woman, who told of being abused for 20 years by her husband, from whom she is now divorced.

"I had a man try to beat me down to zero, but I'm still one and one is a mighty number," the woman said in her sometimes emotional testimony. "I'm going to save my kids, and I expect you to help me do that."

Harper said in his year and a half as district attorney of Douglas County nothing has been more frustrating to him than the cases of domestic violence which cross his desk.

"I have the conviction that it's time to move ahead on this," he told the Judiciary Committee. "I think the frustration is the lack of leadership, and this is where the Legislature can be a help to us."

He urged the Legislature to help with funding for emergency shelters for battered spouses, perhaps through an additional fee on some license.

Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, has suggested increasing the marriage license fee in Kansas in order to generate more revenue for emergency shelters.

Sen. Jack Steineger, D-Kansas City, also suggested restoration of the peace bond in Kansas, which before it was abolished allowed a judge to require people considered risks to commit violence to post bonds and forfeit them if they did.

"It would very effectively handle it," Steineger said of the peace bond's effect on men who beat their wives. "It would hit the batterer in his pocketbook."

Ending a life at others' cost

The California Supreme Court recently denied a California woman the right to starve herself to death while she remained in a California hospital receiving pain killers.

Elizabeth Bouvia has had cerebral palsy since she was very young, and in recent years has been affected by arthritis. She said she no longer wished to remain alive inside a body she said was useless and to continue "depending on someone else for the most humiliating of needs."

Bouvia entered Riverside Hospital some months ago with the intent of dying. She said she wanted the hospital to keep her comfortable and provide her with pain killers while easing her discomfort while she starved herself to death.

The issue of an individual's right to end her own life isn't at stake here. That cannot be addressed in a single editorial and should be considered individually. What is at stake and should be questioned is the right of an individual to force another to be an accomplice to her suicide.

Bouvia's presence at the Riverside Hospital is a disturbing element in that hospital. Bouvia, who has pledged to die, is at odds with the physicians, nurses and other health professionals who have pledged, through their choice of career, to keep her alive.

Bouvia has become well-known due to the widespread publicity of her case, and several anonymous offers have been made threatening to "help" her carry out her wish. Because of these offers, Bouvia had to be moved to a private room with a 24-hour guard to protect her. Once again, her presence there is disturbing to the hospital staff and patients.

Not only does the hospital staff have to contend with force-feeding a woman determined to starve herself, but there are legal ramifications to consider.

It is illegal to commit suicide, and by allowing Bouvia to starve herself, the hospital could be held accountable if she is successful in carrying out her desire. Bouvia's former husband also has threatened the hospital with a legal battle if Bouvia is allowed to die from self-starvation.

It is obvious Elizabeth Bouvia values her life very little. If she believes life is too unbearable for her to continue, that is her personal choice and decision to make. It is not up to someone else to say Bouvia's life is worth living.

However, Bouvia has no right to force her decision and self-assessment on others who have devoted their life to saving and extending the lives of others. If Bouvia is so determined to end her life, there must be alternatives to forcing others to help her do it.

Karen Bellus, for the editorial board

America isn't 'standing tall' at all

Ronnie is at it again.

The president relied on his charismatic personality and acting ability to try to convince Congress and America in his State of the Union speech Wednesday night that "America is back, standing tall."

Poor guy. As Democratic congressional leaders attest, Reagan is out of touch with middle America. The current administration "slight(s) traditional American values," the Democrats said. They're right.

Reagan asked the nation to unite "to keep America free, secure and at peace in the '80s." He said the country is "safer, stronger and more secure in 1984 than before. We can now move with confidence to seize the opportunities for peace, and we will."

Maybe the president should follow the example of Democratic leaders. As a rebuttal to Reagan's speech, the Democratic party produced a 30-minute program with both pre-taped interviews with various Americans and live remarks from Congressional leaders.

The Democrats talked to a steel worker about to be laid off his job in Cleveland, a farmer in Kentucky trying to "make ends meet" and a family who live next to an industrial-waste area. All were disillusioned with the American economy and its effect on their lives.

Not only is Reagan convinced last year's economic growth will continue to help alleviate the budget deficit — predicted to be $200 billion next year — but he believes unemployment will continue to fall and inflation will be brought under control.

But Reagan has forgotten the common American. When was the last time Reagan talked with the core element of the American population? If he did, he might realize the country is not "standing tall." Internal economic problems (partly the result of a careless attitude towards growth), the budget deficit and excessive spending on nuclear arms, keep America bent over instead of tall and straight.

Kansans to continue paying tolls—

As long as the proverbial corpse is warm and there's still enough money in the pocket to pay the toll, the Kansas Turnpike Authority will be there, reaching in to grab a little bit more.

KTA Chairman Nick Badwey, from my hometown of El Dorado, said the five-member board will probably proceed with a plan to issue $100 million in bonds to restore the 236-mile turnpike. While tolls probably won't increase right away, users will be fumbling for change for another 30 or 40 years.

Now, don't get me wrong. Nick's a nice guy. He has been on the KTA off and on for several years, especially when the Democrats were in. Why, Quick Nick, as the sign on the front of his convenience store in Sedgewick County calls him, probably remembers when users were going to be forced to pay tolls for a scant 15 or 20 years.

That was shortly after the road opened in 1958. Slowly, but surely, much like a turnpike traveler groping for change at a toll booth, the ante has been upped until most of the original turnpike users will never live to see the day when those annoying toll tickets no longer are fixtures of dashboards and sun visors. Anything just to keep the darned things from flying out the window.

While one understands the plight of toll roads financed only by user fees, one wonders about the management through the years. When the original bonds were paid off, who did the KTA think was going to keep the road open? The state, of course.

Turnpike officials argue that turning the road over to the state would mean increases in motor fuel taxes and registration fees. We are never told how much. Maybe some of us who frequent the turnpike would gladly pay a few cents, perhaps a few dollars extra to avoid the toll.

In the end, the state would have a fine highway, the difference between tolls paid and taxes paid couldn't be that great and, alas and alack, the KTA could go the way of the Edsel and the hula hoop.

Of course, the KTA, eager to keep its patronage task, argues that out-of-state users pay half the debt service and maintenance costs for the road. So what. The outsiders also pay the motor fuels tax, and the Legislature, which seems more interested in whether a statue of Ceres on the Capitol dome would constitute a heathen idol, could certainly come up with a new tax for trucks.

Were it not for the KTA being a mighty nice political boost for its members — and a tax might end all that — one would think that it would be more than happy to spend and spend and tax and tax.

Obviously, it's more fun for some people to pick pockets and act important than it is to boost Kansas tourism, keep old promises and turn the highway over to those better able to manage their financial affairs.

Well, I'm fed up with the KTA's broken promises. And whenever possible, I'll take an alternate route. We can be sure that tolls will again rise, the authority will again renege and another generation of political spoilage will take the reins.

About the only part of this story that gives me any comfort is the example it sets for tomorrow's child. Someday, about the time the KTA gets this round of bonds paid off, I'll stand on the 'ol turnpike bridge west of El Dorado and tell my grandchildren this tale.

The morals are simple: Don't ever start something you aren't big enough to finish and don't ever make promises you can't keep.

Rising costs catch nuclear plants—

WASHINGTON — A high-ranking official at the Nuclear Regulatory Commission privately told us he would like to have given this advice to the nuclear power industry last week: Quit producing plants and get into the spare parts business.

Nuclear industry moguls obviously wouldn't have gone for such wisdom, but it reflected widespread reaction to the industry's worst battering since the 1979 accident at Three Mile Island. Recent news has added new fuel to the long-standing debate over whether nuclear power can be safe and affordable.

The Public Service Co. of Indiana said it is abandoning a half-finished nuclear power plant on which $2.5 billion had already been spent.

Contending that the project's "astronomical costs are clearly unaffordable," a committee of the Cincinnati City Council unanimously adopted a resolution calling for the abandonment of the beleaguered Zimmer nuclear power plant.

The NRC licensing board denied Commonwealth Edison permission to operate the $3.5 billion Byron Nuclear Power Station near Rockford, Ill.

The Energy Department announced that, for 77 percent of the nuclear plants in operation, final construction costs were at least double initial estimates.

During recent years, of course, nuclear power has undergone similar doses of realism, yet endured. Though the nuclear industry hasn't received a new order for a plant in the United States in five years, it's still at work on 53 projects.

But victims of the Northwest's multibillion-dollar Washington

Public Power Supply System fiasco — where the state's ratepayers were billed up to $120 apiece last year to finance new power plants, only to learn later that the plants will never be built — aren't the only ones bearing the costly burden of blind commitment to nuclear power.

In Long Island, for example, consumers learned recently that the nearly-finished Shoreham plant would add another $470 to the average household's yearly electric bill. In Arizona, ratepayers face a possible increase of 55 percent as a result of two plants; for plants in Pennsylvania (Limerick), New Hampshire (Seabrook) and Louisiana (Grand Gulf), the proposed increases have been 45, 90 and 100 percent, respectively.

Meanwhile, within the next several months, the NRC will solicit suggestions for public comment on how utility companies will assess possibly the biggest cost of all: the permanent shutdown or "decommissioning" of those nuclear plants whose functional life has expired. Of the 88 commercial plants now operating in the United States, at least 51 will require mothballing to complete dismantling between 2003 and 2012. That is, if they don't require closing beforehand.

Though decommissioning is not some unexplored science, its use has been principally limited to federally-sponsored research reactors and others of relatively low output. Its potential price for larger reactors has been estimated at initial power plant construction costs, but the safe removal of bricks, mortar and radioactive components could cost much more.

Apprehension about the eventual price tag has prompted the legislatures in five states — California, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania — to require public utilities to establish separate trusts for decommissioning.

But in keeping with its tradition of rosy scenarios, the industry has resisted predictions that yet another Dunkirk lies ahead for consumers. Indeed, it's likely to fight any major effort to set aside trust funds that it can't use for purposes other than decommissioning and over which it must share control.

The decommissioning dilemma calls to mind an insensitivity apparent in $11 million worth of ads, paid for by the pro-nuclear U.S. Committee for Energy Awareness, assuring consumers that "the sun will come out tomorrow" but that "today is what gets us to tomorrow."

Consumers have heard that siren's song before. The fact that it's still snug reflects a nuclear-industrywide belief that its position has been misrepresented by the media. Little does the industry seem to realize that the facts speak for themselves.

Lack of beer in Union upsets few—

The issue of whether or not to serve beer in the Union is a dead issue.

The case against beer includes several valid points.

Students have been only mildly interested in drinking beer in the Union since 1975, when the state made it legal for the Union to permit its sale.

Union Director Walt Smith said he has only been approached a few times since 1975 by students wondering why the Union does not serve beer.

To further this case, a Union survey taken in January of 1983 showed there is not a strong response to the lack of beer in the Union. In response to the question of whether beer should be served in the Union, 48 percent surveyed said "yes," while 44 percent said "no."

This does not show that a significant majority of students or any other Union patrons are upset over not being able to partake in a cold brew while using the Union.

The Union Governing Board, at its first meeting of this semester, voted against serving beer by a vote of six to four.

The beer issue came up last semester too when the Union Program Council suggested it be able to serve beer at functions it sponsors in the building.

MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Serving beer at UPC functions may have seemed to be a good idea, but it is not fair to limit beer to these functions alone. If the Union serves beer, it should sell it, much like it sells soda pop, candy, tobacco and other items to the public.

While it is evident that the lack of beer in the Union is not causing much distress on the part of patrons, it is possible that the sale of beer would serve to alienate those who use the facility because it does not serve alcoholic beverages.

Those opposed to selling beer in the Union have valid reasons. Students pay a fee to the Union as part of their tuition. Opponents have a right to have their opinions considered since their tuition helps support the facility also.

Beer should not be served in the recreation area because there are probably recreation patrons who choose the Union over other pool halls or bowling lanes because of the fact that there is no beer served there.

K-State is not the only university in the Big Eight which does not serve beer in its Union. Neither the University of Nebraska nor Oklahoma State University serve beer. However, whether or not other university unions serve beer is not relevant.

Serving beer in the Union would not enhance any of the programs offered there, and it may even hinder some programs if Union staff and patrons were forced to deal with such nuisances as drunk patrons and sticky, smelly beer cans and bottles.

True, not everyone who drinks beer becomes unruly and drunk. But it takes only one drunk person to ruin the enjoyment of many people in a place which is known for its pleasant atmosphere.

One of the measures of an excellent university is the quality of its library. We have some ground to move up here at K-State.

we need to express our priorities beyond this campus. Crime Stoppers calls diminish recently

By LUCY REILLY
Collegian Reporter

Recently the number of calls received by the Riley County Crime Stoppers program has decreased, although the program rewards anonymous telephone callers up to $1,000 for their participation in halting crime in Manhattan.

Riley County Police Department Investigator Don Flood, who acts as a liaison between the department and the Crime Stoppers board of directors, attributes the downturn to the Christmas holidays and the weather.

"A lull over Christmas occurred because of the students being gone, coupled with the extreme cold," Flood said.

Concerned with the decrease, the Rev. Ben Duerfeldt, pastor of the First Christian Church and chairman of the board of directors, said he plans to begin a "blitz advertising campaign."

More visibility for Crime Stoppers is needed in the community, Duerfeldt said. He said he thinks the December cold spell was a positive factor in lessening the crime rate.

"Crooks don't like to get out in 50-below wind chill," Duerfeldt said. Crime Stoppers began in Albuquerque, N.M., and uses information from the public to help decrease the rate of crime. If a person witnesses a crime, he is asked to call a special telephone number. Anonymity is assured to the caller, and he is given a code number.

A group of citizens initiated Crime Stoppers in Manhattan in October 1982.

In its first full year, Crime Stoppers helped to solve 65 crimes and recover $27,148 worth of stolen property, Duerfeldt said. Reward money totaled $3,550 for the first year. Five crimes have been reported for the first weeks of 1984, he said.

Reward money is allocated to a caller based on whether the information given leads to the arrest or recovery of stolen property, Flood said.

The amount awarded to an individual is decided by the board depending on the severity of the crime, Mike Kuhn, Crime Stoppers vice president, said.

Funds for advertising and reward money are received from donations, Kuhn said. Fund-raising events also are conducted to benefit Crime Stoppers.

Flood said anyone with information about a crime in Riley County should call Crime Stoppers at 539-7777.

Vandals burglarize Chevy

Between 6 p.m. Jan. 5 and 8:30 a.m. Jan. 7, someone burglarized a car which was left on the side of K-18 Highway near Ogden.

The burglary occurred when an unknown person broke out the passenger-side rear window of the victim's yellow Chevette. Once inside the vehicle, the person removed a portable multi-band cassette player and a Samsonite shoulder bag. The suspects also stole the Pioneer KP-2000 in-dash stereo unit, along with the Pioneer TX-9 speakers that were sitting in the rear portion of the car.

After removing the items, the suspects then set off bottle rockets inside the vehicle, causing numerous burn spots.

The suspects also removed a portion of the tailpipe from the vehicle. Total loss in the incident is more than $1,200.

Housing department renovates 2 Jardine units

Approximately 24 Jardine Terrace families have been relocated while the Department of Housing continues its renovation program.

The renovation program for the Jardine housing development, which was built in 1957, began with the repair of units H, R, and V last year. This year, units I and N will be repaired, Lloyd Davenport, housing maintenance superintendent, said.

Jardine residents are relocated to other apartments in different Jardine units while the renovation takes place, Don Roof, family housing coordinator, said.

The department aids residents with relocation.

"They (Jardine housing development staff) help you move in and offer to pay for your phone and cable transfer, but it's your option to move back (to the original apartment) once it is fixed up. They won't pay for your transfers again," Kim An-draws, senior in elementary education and resident of building N, said.

The housing department plans to renovate all 26 units of Jardine at a rate of two per year, Davenport said.

Renovating each unit includes replacing windows and balcony decks, installing showers, replacing kitchen cabinets, insulating ceilings, repairing floor tiles, light fixtures and faucets and installing ceramic tile in the bathroom.

Renovation for units I and N will be completed by next fall, Davenport said.

Florida death row prisoner quotes Christ's last words

By The Associated Press

STARKE, Fla. — Quoting Christ's words on the cross, Florida's oldest death row inmate died in the electric chair Thursday for arranging the killing of a private detective, becoming the third man executed in the state in less than five years.

"The only thing is, 'Forgive them, Father, for in their ignorance they know not what they do.' And that's it." Those were the last words of Anthony Antone, 66, heard in a clear voice over a microphone in the death chamber.

He was pronounced dead at 7:08 a.m., seven minutes after the first surge of 2,000 volts coursed through his body.

Antone was the 12th person executed in the United States since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment eight years ago. He is the only one put to death for a killing he did not commit himself.

About 25 people, including a Nobel prize winner, gathered outside Florida State Prison to protest the execution, which was delayed two days under a temporary stay while his lawyers unsuccessfully appealed to the nation's highest court.

Antone was convicted of arranging the 1975 contract murder of Richard Cloud, a former Tampa vice detective who was gunned down when he answered his doorbell.

Two others charged in the case, including the confessed triggerman, were found dead in their jail cells, their deaths ruled suicides. The driver of the getaway car testified against Antone and is serving a 35-year sentence.

Prison officials described Antone as "calm but not communicative" after he was told the Supreme Court on Wednesday night had cleared the way for the execution, ruling his arguments had been weighed and rejected before.

Astronaut flies into race

LANSING, Mich. — Jack Lousma, who commanded the space shuttle Columbia on its third flight, took to the air again Thursday to formally launch his campaign for the U.S. Senate.

Lousma announced his candidacy at the state Capitol, the first stop on a two-day, five-city flying tour. He will seek the Republican nomination to run against Democratic Sen. Carl Levin, who is serving his first term.

"Twenty-five years ago, I made a commitment to serve my country — a commitment that has led me from Michigan to the Marine Corps to missions in space," said the 47-year-old retired Marine colonel. "That same commitment brings me home today."

Lousma was raised in Ann Arbor, though he has lived in recent years near NASA headquarters in Houston.

He received an aeronautical engineering degree from the University of Michigan and spent 59 days in orbit as part of Skylab's second manned mission in 1973. He was commander of the space shuttle Columbia in 1982.

Several other former astronauts have sought elective office, most notably John Glenn, who is a senator from Ohio and a contender for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Reagan's son to pass torch

LOS ANGELES — Michael Reagan, the president's oldest son, will be one of the runners carrying the Olympic torch on its 12,000-mile relay from Greece to Los Angeles, an Olympics spokesman says.

Reagan, 38, will pay $3,000 to participate in the "Youth Legacy Kilometer" for the summer Games, Steve Montiel of the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee said Wednesday. The money goes to various youth groups.

President Reagan's son volunteered to run in the relay at a leadership meeting of the Orange County Task Force for the Olympic Torch Run, said Diane Dailacis, co-chairwoman of the Task Force.

Any individual, corporation, group or business can buy a kilometer of the run for $3,000, Montiel said. Ten thousand kilometers have been reserved for the fund-raiser, with 2,000 of them already committed.

New stamp on sale today

WASHINGTON — A new stamp goes on sale nationwide today honoring Harry Truman, the 33rd president, on the 100th anniversary of his birth.

The stamp is part of the Great Americans series and will be on sale for several years as one of the regular 20-cent stamps.

The ceremonies marking the first day of issue of the stamp were held in the Senate Caucus Room where Truman headed a committee that explored the errors and responsibilities involved in the Pearl Harbor attack.

Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton, Democratic senator from Truman's home state of Missouri, noted during the ceremony that Truman, as a senator, "established a national reputation for demanding that the taxpayers get their money's worth and that our fighting men had the most effective and reliable equipment in the world."

Postmaster General William F. Bolger presented a sheet of the new stamp to dignitaries attending the ceremony including Margaret Truman Daniel, daughter of the president.

Children may need evacuation training

By The Associated Press

EMPORIA — The Federal Emergency Management Agency plans to recommend that parents and teachers educate children living near the Wolf Creek Nuclear Generating Station about radiation and what would happen in an evacuation, a FEMA staff member testified Thursday.

The Atomic Safety and Licensing Board of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission on Thursday concluded nine days of hearings at Emporia State University on the licensing of Wolf Creek. The hearings will resume Feb. 14.

Two women who live near Wolf Creek, Wanda Christy and Mary Ellen Salava, have challenged the licensing of the power plant. Both contend that emergency plans are inadequate.

Mary Marlee Carroll, who oversees reviews of local and state emergency response plans, said FEMA would recommend that teachers provide information to reinforce the information that children receive at home.

"I believe their questions would exceed the level of information that would be in the brochures," Carroll said.

Richard J. Leonard, who evaluates local and state emergency response plans for FEMA, said evacuation confirmation — the time it would take to confirm that evacuation was complete — could be handled by the county engineer because of the number of personnel available to him.

Sigma Chis to sponsor international workshop

K-State's Sigma Chi chapter will sponsor the largest annual greek training workshop in the world this year.

Approximately 900 people from 182 chapters throughout the United States and Canada are invited to attend the Sigma Chi International Leadership Training Workshop.

The workshop is scheduled for Aug. 9-12, Ron Morris, senior in marketing and undergraduate host chapter coordinator, said.

The workshop is divided into divisions for presidents, pledge trainers and rush chairmen, Morris said. There also are divisions for basic chapter training, chapter advisors, grand praetors (province alumni advisors) and locals (local chapters petitioning Sigma Chi). The K-State chapter is part of the Kansas-Nebraska province.

A Significant Sigma award will be given to a former Sigma Chi who has excelled in his field, Morris said. Possible candidates include the president of Pepsi-Cola and Tom Selleck.

There also will be a program for distinguished faculty associates.

"These are prominent Sigma Chis, who are most often already Significant Sigmas, who come to speak with the delegates," Morris said.

The keynote speaker has yet been chosen.

As the host chapter, the K-State Sigma Chis are responsible for transporting delegates to and from the airport and for registration, Morris said. They also are responsible for general on-campus assistance, entertainment, Sunday morning worship services and promotion to local businesses.

Delegates to the workshop, who pay $145 each to attend, will be housed in Ford and West Halls. Registration will take place in Derby Food Center, and the general assembly meetings will take place in McCain Auditorium. A banquet also will be given in the Union.

The K-State Sigma Chis began bidding for the workshop about 1975, Morris said.

"Our chapter found out we were actually going to get it about a year and a half ago," he said.

K-State was chosen to host the workshop because it is being considered for the permanent home of the workshop, Morris said.

Sitcom examines abortion attitudes

By The Associated Press

Nothing is sacred to Bill Bittinger, except Bill Bittinger. But how does he react when his occasional girlfriend becomes pregnant and considers an abortion?

For the most part, the insensitive talk-show host, played impeccably by Dabney Coleman, is his usual egotistical self. He views the pregnancy as an affirmation of his masculinity.

But in one exceptional solo scene, in which he re-creates a Yankee Stadium baseball fantasy complete with the voices of broadcasters Mel Allen and Red Barber, Bill expresses the feelings he can never verbalize. If centerfielder Bill Bittinger catches the ball, there will be no abortion.

The two part episode of NBC's "Buffalo Bill," titled "Jo-Jo's Problem," began last night and concludes Feb. 2. It is hilarious and moving television, not really an examination of the abortion issue as much as one comedic illustration of how these characters might deal with it.

In life, humor is one way of coping with problems and pain, but traditional situation comedy, underestimating the intelligence of the audience, has mostly steered clear of anything stickier than the heroine burning the roast.

That changed in the 1970s, when "M*A*S*H" joked about death, "All in the Family" laughed about bigotry, and its spinoff, "Maude" tweaked knee-jerk liberalism. Bea Arthur's Maude was the first sitcom character to have an abortion, in Nov. 14 and 21, 1972, a double episode that drew heavy viewer protest.

"Buffalo Bill" has taken some similarly serious turns, not necessarily for informational or social reasons, but to explore Bill's outrageous personality under the greatest variety of stimuli.

Later this season, Bill entertains a nuclear-freeze discussion on the "Buffalo Bill Show" — not to educate his audience, but to get back in Jo-Jo's good graces.

On a series dominated by Coleman, the episodes this week and next allow Joanna Cassidy, as Jo-Jo, to show a wider range of emotions. Normally an agreeable, conciliatory sort, she's fighting mad, saying she feels "alone, dirty and betrayed."

Her anger emphasizes her dilemma, since she isn't seen ruminating about the decision to have the baby. If Bill could make a sincere commitment, she seems willing to try motherhood. Jo-Jo is an intelligent, attractive woman, but she dislikes her lonely single life so much that Bill becomes an alternative.

Cassidy, the divorced mother of two children, said she was happy with her character's decision to have the abortion, and the way it was treated.

"It was handled with dignity," she said. "My personal view is that I don't feel anybody should tell you not to have one."

Opera plays Thursday

Company to perform 'La Boheme'

It had long been the dream of Beverly Sills, famed opera singer, to establish a means by which young singers could obtain valuable performing experience while bringing opera to areas of the country which are rarely exposed to it.

Sills' goal was achieved in 1979 when she founded the National Opera Touring Company. Now making its second tour, the company will perform Thursday in McCain Auditorium, only one of four stops for the company in the Midwest.

"We are really fortunate. That's quite an honor," said Edith Hinrichs, director of audience development for McCain.

Manhattan will be the fifth stop on the company's 21-stop 1984 tour.

The group will perform Giacomo Puccini's "La Boheme," a story of four impoverished artists living on Paris' left bank in the early 19th century. The opera follows the lives of the "bohemians" as the artists share good and bad times.

"La Boheme" premiered in 1896 to an enthusiastic audience. Although Puccini was to later compose the music for two well-known operas, "Tosca" and "Madame Butterfly," "La Boheme" was the only one to have been well-received initially. Its careful blend between libretto and music have made it one of the most popular operas of all time.

The critically acclaimed maiden tour of the National Opera Touring Company was a 34-city, eight-week tour of Verdi's "La Traviata" in fall, 1980 and spring, 1981. Special projects undertaken by the company in the 1980-81 season included a performance of Rossini's "The Barber Of Seville" and five performances of Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" in Bermuda.

In 1981 the company underwent several changes. Its name was changed to the New York City Opera National Company, and its original two-fold objective was expanded to include a third purpose — providing veteran New York City Opera singers with an opportunity to try out new roles. As a result, the tour cities receive productions featuring seasoned performers as well as the best of young talent.

The company's current tour has a budget of more than $500,000 and will stretch from New York to Palm Springs. The tour also marks the group's debut in Canada.

The performing ensemble for the 1984 tour includes a 30-piece orchestra, 14 soloists, 15 choristers and 14 staff members. The production of "La Boheme" was designed especially for the company.

'World According to Beaver' chronicles series

It could be titled "Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Beaver Cleaver but Were Afraid to Ask."

Beaver, his brother Wally, their mother June, father Ward, and friends Eddie Haskell, Lumpy Rutherford and Larry Mondello are about to be celebrated in "The World According to Beaver," an illustrated guide to the popular situation comedy "Leave It To Beaver."

The book, written by Irwyn Applebaum and available to the public in April, contains dialogue and photographs from various episodes of the show. It also includes an introduction from Jerry Mathers, who portrayed Beaver.

Applebaum based "The World According to Beaver" on studies of original scripts and videotapes of each episode, as well as interviews with most of the show's cast.

The book contains a production history of the series; more than 200 "Beaver" dialogue extracts; photographs; samples of Beaver's compositions, poems, and diaries; forged notes to teachers; Mayfield High cheers; and the complete lyrics to the recent pop-music single, "Beaver Cleaver Fever," performed by Angel and the Reruns.

Also included are various sections such as "Eddie's Dating Tips (I got my mother to call her mother, and her mother made her go out with me)," "Brothers," "June's Rules to Live By," "How to Talk Mean and Dirty Like the Beaver (I'd rather kiss a dead lizard than kiss you again)," and "Girls (Go see a girl? I'd rather smell a skunk)."

Although no new episodes have been produced for over 20 years, "Leave It To Beaver" is a television series whose popularity seems to be greater now than during the six years it ran on television. Its 234 episodes, which originally ran between 1957 and 1963, have been rerun for years throughout the country. The principal actors are in frequent television reunions and in-person appearances.

Film grosses high, despite Super Sunday

By The Associated Press

"Terms of Endearment" continued to endear itself to moviegoers this week, holding the top money-making spot with its poignant tale of a mother-daughter relationship, while a raucous ski film, "Hot Dog," placed second.

One film that failed to make a splash in its debut was 20th Century Fox's "The Buddy System," starring Richard Dreyfuss and Susan Sarandon. It grossed $524,627 in 190 theaters.

"The figures don't make me fly up to the sky. But this was a two-day weekend rather than a three-day weekend because of the Super Bowl, so I don't see it as a total loss," producer Alain Chummas said.

Here are the films that weathered Super Sunday in high style, followed by the weekend's receipts, the total receipts to date and weeks in distribution:

1. "Terms of Endearment," $3.5 million, $60.7 million, 9 weeks.
2. "Hot Dog," $3.1 million, $9 million, 2 weeks.
3. "Silkwood," $2.5 million, $17 million, 6 weeks.
4. "Sudden Impact," $2.2 million, $57.6 million, 7 weeks.
5. "Never Cry Wolf," $1.9 million, $10.3 million, 9 weeks.
6. "Yentl," $1.8 million, $28.2 million, 10 weeks.
7. "Scarface," $1.5 million, $32 million, 7 weeks.

Artist utilizes tradition to create abstraction

An exhibit of watercolors and prints inspired by the architecture of ancient Egypt is currently being shown in the Union Art Gallery.

Artist Keith Achepohl utilizes different geometric shapes, sizes and various color schemes in his work, which will be in the gallery through Feb. 3.

The exhibit is sponsored by the Union Program Council Arts Committee.

In a catalog of Achepohl's work titled "Egypt: Day & Night," Andrew Robison, curator of Prints and Drawings for the National Gallery of Art in Washington D.C., states that his work has combined the "centuries-old tradition of architectural fantasies" with "twentieth-century abstraction."

Achepohl is currently a professor of art at the University of Iowa. He has given many one-man and group exhibitions in the United States and internationally.

The decision to exhibit Achepohl's works in the Union was made by the UPC Arts Committee through a selection process and the recommendation of Achepohl by Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art.

"Everyone (on the committee) was very impressed by his work," Marilyn Gilbert, UPC program adviser said.

Achepohl is to speak at a public lecture at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Little Theatre. He will show slides of his works and discuss them. The lecture is open to the public. A reception will follow in the gallery.

Gilbert said Achepohl's lecture is important because it is rare that an artist is able to appear with his exhibit.

Achepohl's works are on display in several museums, including the National Museum of American Art, the National Gallery of Art and the Art Institute of Chicago.

Rainy Day's experiment validates modern music

By SUSAN BENDER
Collegian Reviewer

Rainy Day. The album, the band. Perfect listening for just that, a rainy day — or any other.

Rainy Day, the band, consists of members from 3 o'clock, Rain Parade, Bangles and the Dream Syndicate.

"Rainy Day", the album, consists of songs written by Bob Dylan, Lou Reed and "traditional," among others.

What can be expected from this album? A conglomeration of mutated cover versions? Bob Dylan with psychedelic feedback? Hardly. In fact, "Rainy Day" is one of the most pleasurable experiences recent music has had to offer.

It is a colorful, homogenous experiment in folk music, by musicians who would be more at home in paisley shirts and tie-dyed pants. Neo-Psychedelia meets "I was a teen-age rocker."

Of particular appeal is the cover version of the Velvet Underground's "I'll Be Your Mirror." Vocalist Susanna Hoffs, of the Bangles, was not afraid to deviate from the original version performed by Nico, as part of Andy Warhol's Exploding Plastic Inevitable assemblage.

Hoff's version of "Mirror" is lighter and more accessible than that of the Velvet Underground. Although it lacks the "Night of the Living Dead" sensation of the original, it comes across as more complete and fulfilling.

Two other excellent renditions on the album are Bob Dylan's "I'll Keep It With Mine," and the traditional song "Sloop John B."

The Dylan song also is sung by Hoffs, and it loses nothing in the gender transfer. If one were to examine the selection of material for this album, it would in fact be easy to point to Dylan's lyrics, You search Spain at any cost, but how long babe will you search for what's

Album rating system

In order to aid the reader in determining the relative worth of an album, the Collegian employs a rating system in album reviews. The system is as follows:

* Poor
Not recommended.

 Fair
Worth consideration for fans of a particular musical style.

 Good
Well done, but contains some major flaws.

* Very Good
Successful overall, with a few minor flaws.

 Excellent
A must for any comprehensive music collection.

Instructor criticizes U.S. policy

By BRAD STUCKY
Collegian Reporter

The United States is guilty of human rights violations by supporting a right-wing government in El Salvador, Dan Crosswell, graduate student and temporary instructor in history, said Wednesday at a meeting of the K-State History Club.

Crosswell elaborated on his paper, "The Future of an Illusion: Ideology and Struggle in El Salvador," at the meeting.

Crosswell said land reforms and other helpful programs can only be implemented if the United States stops "propping up a tottering regime."

The Salvadoran regime is known for its oppression and death squads, he said.

The United States is "forsaking its democratic ideals and principles" by violating the Salvadorans' rights, he said. As long as the Reagan administration continues to pour in aid, the strife is hardly a new problem.

In 1931, Martinez, a fascist, took office. He brought with him a "system of ruthless modernization." Under his power, 30,000 civilians were killed. His presidency set the stage for future dictators, Crosswell said.

In 1944, the Salvadorans over-militaristic government will remain in power.

Crosswell's documented history of El Salvador shows internal threw the government and looked to the United States for support. They were denied, and again the far-right assumed control.

The Salvadorans then looked to the Cuban revolution as a model. The U.S. administration took notice and presented aid to the government in command to suppress communism. This philosophy is still held today, he said.

As the oppression grew worse, the opposition became more fierce. The rebels moved to the hills and began organizing troops.

In 1972, Duarte, the Christian Democrat candidate, won the majority of votes, but was denied the office by a rigged election.

In 1977, a state of siege was declared, and many students and civilians were killed. This forced the Christian Democrats to side with the rebels, and thus become targets of the death squads. These killers had elevated to wiping out any opposition — Marxist and modernist — and harassing the church, Crosswell said.

"By 1980, the Faribundo Marti Liberation Front, or FMLN, began scoring major victories against the government and touched off a civil war that rages on," he said.

Crosswell emphasized that until U.S. aid is stopped and reforms are gradually allowed to take place, there can be no peace. "Otherwise, we must be prepared to prop up a long line of oppressive regimes," he said.

Educator urges ban of competency tests

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Washburn University education professor urged lawmakers Thursday not to reinstate competency testing for Kansas elementary and secondary students, saying the program encourages mediocre instruction in schools.

Jesse Goodman made the remarks in testimony to the Senate Education Committee, which is considering a bill to resume reading and mathematics testing of children next year in grades 2, 4, 6, 8 and 11.

"This bill, if passed, will promote continued mediocrity in Kansas schools," Goodman said.

Thursday's testimony was a continuation of a hearing begun earlier this week. Competency testing in Kansas elementary and secondary schools was first used in 1978 and continued for two years. The 1981 Legislature continued the program for two more years. The proposed legislation would require testing to resume in 1985 and continue for at least five years.

"When I go out to the schools I see teachers teaching for this test," Goodman told the committee.

He said use of competency testing scores to compare schools and teachers encourages competition, making test scores — not instruction — the goal of education.

"Reading is a means to an end, not an end in itself," Goodman said. "I would ask you to make sure your test does not end up dictating an approach to reading that is very limiting."

The committee also heard testimony on a bill to raise the age for compulsory school attendance from 16 to 18.

Sen. Billy McCray, D-Wichita, one of two sponsors of the legislation, said high school drop-outs are a public problem.

"It is my experience that they either become welfare recipients or start matriculating through the prison system," said McCray.

Jerry Schreiner, spokesman for United School Administrators of Kansas, said he opposed the bill.

"What I'm talking about is a flexibility in developing programs that would make them (students) want to stay in school," Schreiner said.

The reason—who benefits

Pacesetters is an opportunity for graduating students to make a change in the amount of scholarships for K-Staters. Our competitive edge is to offer attractive incentives to incoming and current students. The Pacesetter Scholars Program will become a valuable source of scholarships based solely on financial need and campus involvement. Any one of the over 250 registered university organizations qualifies.

The benefit of the Pacesetter Challenge is two-fold:

- a greater number of future K-Staters will be able to study at our institution and to enjoy the things we do, and
- the investment we make toward scholarships will provide a continual source of pride for Kansas State University.

The program—how it works

Pacesetters is a pledged commitment of only $20 a year for 3 years, a total of $60.

During your final year on campus, we ask that you make a sincere pledge to the Pacesetter Challenge. Pledges will be paid starting one year after graduation for the next three years.

"The need for scholarships is definitely a real one. I am proud to have a part in fulfilling this need through the Pacesetter Program."

Julie Martin
 KSU Ambassador 1982-1983

"We are fortunate at Kansas State University that each student pay approximately 25% of their cost of education. Efforts of faculty, staff, alumni, parents and friends of the University through the KSU Foundation provide assistance to the University for many of our students. The Pacesetter program offers an opportunity for each student who has benefitted from their years at Kansas State University to make a commitment to provide assistance for students that follow. Each person has a stake in the future of higher education. Pacesetters are making theirs."

Student Foundation

Our Focus

The Kansas State Student Foundation was established in 1981 as a service, public relations and fund raising organization with programs and activities that are designed to meet some of the ever changing needs of the University.

The broad scope of our activities offers our members many opportunities for involvement and leadership. We work with administrators and faculty throughout the University and our events are open to all students and interested persons. A primary objective of the Student Foundation is to instill a deeper sense of pride and commitment to Kansas State through positive, fun and challenging experiences.

Our tradition

During the past three years we have participated in and sponsored a variety of activities:

- Our major annual event is a fall, all-university party/dance to raise funds for our Student Foundation Scholarship. (1982, The Fall Fallout-1983, The Flash Back)
- We have recruited phone callers for the spring annual Telefund sponsored by the KSU Foundation and this year are soliciting prizes for top callers.
- We sponsor the Friday night activity for the All-University Open House. This year we're proud to announce that we are hosting the Air Force Rock Band "Night Wing" on March 30 followed by a dance in the K-State Union.
- A year ago at the K-State/KU Football game we held a Spirit Banner Contest to encourage enthusiasm and competition between living units.

Our members

Members in Student Foundation come from all colleges and disciplines on campus. Membership is open to any full-time enrolled student at Kansas State. We are responsible for planning and implementing each activity and participate according to our time and interests.

Expert witness testifies against USFL Gamblers

By The Associated Press

DETROIT — Prominent sports attorney Robert Woolf of Boston testified Thursday that Jerry Argovitz had a clear conflict of interest when he signed Detroit Lions running back Billy Sims to the Houston Gamblers.

Argovitz is a part owner and president of the Gamblers.

Woolf's testimony came in a trial before U.S. District Judge Robert E. DeMascio that will determine whether Sims will continue to play for the National Football League's Detroit Lions or go to the Gamblers, an expansion team in the United States Football League.

Sims signed contracts with both teams last year, but has said he prefers to remain in Detroit.

The 1978 Heisman Trophy winner is suing the Gamblers and Argovitz, who was Sims' agent at the time the former University of Oklahoma star signed with the Gamblers. Sims' current attorneys are trying to show that the Houston contract, signed July 1, should be voided because Argovitz was in conflict of interest and negligent in his representation of the running back.

Woolf, who has negotiated more than 1,800 contracts for 400 athletes in virtually every sport in America, testified as an expert witness. Prior to his appearance on the stand, Woolf had been permitted to study a packet of material related to the case.

The material included letters written in early June between Lions attorney Frederick C. Nash and Argovitz, an offer from Argovitz to the Lions which defined a comprehensive offer, a copy of the July 1 contract Sims signed with the Gamblers, a July 8 letter from Nash to Argovitz and the Dec. 16 contract Sims signed with the Lions.

Marvin Smith, a partner of Sims' chief attorney, Elbert Hatchett, asked Woolf if the evidence indicated the Lions had been dragging their feet in negotiations prior to the time Sims signed with the Gamblers.

"It looks to me like the Lions made a bona fide offer," Woolf replied. "It's obvious (from copies of the correspondence) they are coming together. They were quite far apart, then by June 22 they are quite close together and appear almost in agreement."

Woolf said he thought it would be important to tell a player of any possible conflict, and said such disclosure should be full — including salary, percent of ownership and participation of income.

Testimony has shown that Argovitz invested $2 million in borrowed money to help finance the Gamblers and is responsible for 30 percent of a $1.5 million letter of credit issued to the Houston team by a Texas bank. Argovitz is being paid $275,000 a year as president of the Gamblers, plus 5 percent of the net proceeds from the franchise.

Aqua course offers fitness alternative

The Aqua Fitness classes offered by K-State Recreational Services offer an alternative way to become physically fit for those who do not like to work out in a gym.

The course is offered to help participants tone and stretch various parts of the body, said Sandy Marlay, senior in elementary education and instructor of the class. Marlay, who has advanced life-saving and water safety instructor certificates, also works as a lifeguard at the Natatorium.

"Anyone with a validated identification card or a facility use card for instructors or alumni may attend the class," Marlay said.

No academic credit is given for the course, but there is no charge or age limit, she said.

The class began Tuesday and will meet each Tuesday, Thursday and Friday from 2:35 to 3:30 p.m. until the end of the semester.

"We have been averaging about 20 people (per class), and I thought it would taper off as the class progressed, but it has really stayed pretty consistent. I think it (attendance) is probably going to end up at about 13," Marlay said.

The class does not involve aerobic exercise, but concentrates on cardiovascular fitness.

Marlay said it's a good way to exercise in addition to aerobic exercise because it is relaxing after a workout.

"I joined the class for purely selfish reasons," said Patti Johnson, senior in elementary education. "I want to look better and feel better."

Marla Steiner, junior in family life and human development said she "joined the class to get into shape. The harder you work, the more you get out of it."

Marlay has taught the course before and said she invented several exercises herself to go with those in some books on water fitness that she owns.

K-State to clash with rival 'Hawks'

'Cats on road again

Dixon may perform

K-State will continue its hunt for a Big Eight Conference basketball victory as the Wildcats travel to Lawrence to meet archrival University of Kansas Saturday.

The Jayhawks are coming off an impressive 77-61 victory against the University of Nebraska. The 'Huskers led the game at intermission, 38-34, but Kansas came out smoking in the second half, led by Carl Henry's 15 second-half points to give the 'Hawks an 11-5 overall record, including a 3-1 conference mark.

Kansas Head Coach Larry Brown said the second half was the best half of basketball his team had played this season.

Henry is Kansas' leading scorer this season, averaging 14.7 points per game. Greg Dreiling is the only other Jayhawk in double figures, hitting at a rate of 10.1 points per game.

The 'Hawks' lone loss in conference play was at the hands of Iowa State University. Along with a victory against Nebraska, Kansas has beaten Colorado and Missouri and shares the top spot in the Big Eight with the University of Oklahoma.

This is the 201st meeting between the intrastate rivals, with Kansas holding a 118-82 edge in victories. However, K-State has won the last five meetings between the two schools, which is the most wins in a row ever by the Wildcats in this series.

In their final meeting last season in Lawrence, K-State dumped the Jayhawks 70-63. Jim Roder tossed in 17 points and grabbed seven rebounds to lead the 'Cats in both categories. Kelly Knight scored 17 and contributed 12 rebounds for Kansas.

Their records are quite different, but Lady 'Cat Head Coach Lynn Hickey said she expects a typical archrival basketball showdown when K-State invades Allen Field House Saturday in Lawrence to face the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks.

K-State will enter the contest with a 13-3 overall record and a 3-0 slate in Big Eight Conference play. Kansas is 6-9 overall and 2-1 in conference games, but is coming off a big 90-89 win over the University of Nebraska.

The Lady Jayhawks are led by senior Angie Snider and the sister tandem of Barbara and Vickie Adkins. Snider, a 5-foot-10 forward, is averaging almost 25 points a contest, while the Adkins sisters are bringing a combined average of 24 points to Saturday's encounter. Snider canned 29 points, Vickie Adkins hit 25 and Barbara Adkins contributed 13 in the Lady 'Hawks' win over Nebraska.

"Kansas has a good team," Hickey said. "I think they're one of the better teams in the Big Eight Conference, and we'll have to play our very best. It will be a typical KU-K-State battle.

Sophomores Jones, Sheronda Jenkins and Cassandra Jones, freshman Carlisa Thomas and senior Angie Bonner are the probable K-State starters, with previously-injured Tina Dixon expected to see action. Bonner (13.1 points per game), Cassandra Jones (11.7 points per game) and Jennifer Jones (11.1 points per game) have led the 'Cats recently, all three providing double-figure scoring in K-State's last two Big Eight confrontations.

Tipoff for the women's game is at 1 p.m.

P.E. course teaches students to determine total body fat

Attending K-State's Concepts of Physical Education class not only fulfills a graduation requirement, but it could help those who want to become more physically fit.

As part of the course, students determine their percentage of body fat by using one of several tests.

"A skin fold test is used to determine total body fat," said Anthony Wilcox, assistant professor of physical education, dance and leisure studies.

Wilcox said there have been a number of calculations generated by research to calculate body fat by measuring the thickness of the skin fold in certain areas of the body. The test that is used in concepts classes is just one of the many methods available.

A more exact way to measure body fat is by weighing a person in a tank of water.

"We have a tank in our lab (used by the exercise physiology class) where we can determine somebody's percent of body fat," Wilcox said. "It's for research when we're conducting studies on the effect of exercise on body fat levels."

When testing a female in concepts class, skin fold measurements are taken from the triceps midway on the back of the arm and from slightly above the hip bone. For males, the measurements are taken from folds slightly below the lower angle of the shoulder blade and midway on the front of the thigh.

Wilcox said that the key to reducing body fat is to "do aerobic exercises (walking, jogging, swimming), because they will use fat as a fuel source."

Wilcox said the fastest way to achieve a reduction in body fat is through a combination of proper diet and exercise, but he said many people turn to dieting and fail to exercise.

"The real problem of people gaining weight is that they're not burning the calories," he said. "It's not so much that they are taking in excess of normal amounts of food, but they're not burning off the calories they are taking in."

Bond issue begets museum

Dallas seeks cultural esteem

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — The name has been chiseled by hand above the entrance, and artworks from Europe, Africa and the Americas have been carefully placed inside Dallas' $50 million play for respectability in the art world and cultural excellence at home.

On Sunday, after numerous gala parties for the wealthy and the generous, Dallas will open its new Museum of Art to the public.

The museum, a limestone and steel giant, was designed by architect Edward Larrabee Barnes with rounded entranceways and inner courtyards that accentuate an open feeling and exploit natural lighting. But city leaders say the fortress-like building on the northern end of downtown is more than just a place to display art.

"There is a recognition here that an art museum is an integral part of a great city, and the city had gotten ahead of the museum and other cultural activities," said Irvin Levy, president of the museum's trustees and president of Irving-based NCH Corp.

Dallasites, who do very few things in a small way, combined a $24.8 million bond issue — the largest sum raised by public referendum for a cultural project anywhere in the nation — with more than $27.6 million in private contributions for the 210,000-square-foot showcase.

Now museum officials, mindful that better-endowed institutions have acquired stronger collections, want more money.

"This puts us on the art map, but we need to significantly increase our endowment," said museum Director Harry S.

Parker III.

"We're still in the gathering stage. When we find something we want now, we have to match it with a donor willing to buy it for us," he said.

Steven Nash, chief curator, has the task of buying Dallas' culture.

"It's a very complicated project. People underestimate what we are trying to accomplish," Nash said. "Without fine works, all you have is a hollow shell. And it's very difficult to just go out and buy a collection."

The major strengths of the museum are pre-Columbian, African and post-World War II American art, with what museum officials call "emerging strengths" in 19th century and early modern European paintings and 18th and 19th century American paintings.

Professor studies squirrel behavior

By LYNN MEIER
Collegian Reporter

A K-State research team has spent several years researching the habits and behavior patterns of squirrels on campus.

The research by Chris Smith, professor of biology, and Marty Stepanian, former K-State graduate student in biology, focused on the squirrels' method of collecting and burying nuts, which is called scatterhoarding, Smith said.

"Scatterhoarding is the process by which the squirrels collect and randomly bury the acorns and walnuts for winter and spring survival," Smith said.

A single squirrel can bury up to 100 nuts at varying densities. The squirrels scatter the nuts in low concentrations so other squirrels don't find them easily, he said.

"Squirrels usually bury their store of walnuts and acorns at a density of one nut per 100 square meters," Smith said.

The squirrels are able to remember the exact location of the nuts which have been buried with the aid of landmarks such as trees and rocks. The squirrel's highly developed sense of smell can be used to find nuts which were buried by other squirrels, Smith said.

"In our research, we wrapped the nuts in aluminum foil and buried them at varying densities. We then used metal detectors to follow the survival of the nuts," he said.

In past years, the fox squirrel population on campus has been as high as 100, but this year the population has decreased to 30 to 40 squirrels, he said.

"Squirrels are not able to defend their food supply against the attack of larger animals. Burial of nuts provides a hiding place for food so birds are not able to get to the supply either," Smith said.

The anatomy of the squirrel is very functional for climbing and digging. The forearms of the squirrel are so highly developed that when a squirrel climbs a tree, it is doing the equivalent of a chin-up, Smith said.

In the United States, there are three basic species of squirrels; fox, pine and gray squirrels. The species are unable to live compatibly in the same area because they are territorial animals. If an area provided a relatively low source of food, squirrels would be forced to carry their food a long distance from the place it is found to the cache for the food on the squirrel's own territory, Smith said.

Smith began his research on squirrels as a graduate student at the University of Washington. He and his wife lived in a log cabin in the Cascade Mountains for more than 18 months and studied squirrels of the pine forest.

Mahaffey takes stand during hearing's close

By ALAN STOLFUS
News Editor

Ben Mahaffey's only sin was airing his problems "outside the family," David Schauner, Mahaffey's attorney, said Friday evening in his closing statement of the nine-day appeal hearing.

"Testimony has shown that Harold Gallaher (former head of the Department of Forestry) was not too receptive to anyone with a grievance. You especially didn't take your problems outside the family, and that was Ben Mahaffey's only sin — he filed a grievance," thus opening forestry department problems to public scrutiny, Schauner said.

Schauner told the six-member special faculty committee if Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, is found guilty of professional incompetence, it should be "beyond a reasonable doubt."

"This panel ought to have enough evidence to find beyond a reasonable doubt before ruling this man is professionally incompetent. I believe if this board finds Dr. Mahaffey professionally incompetent he will be untouchable in the academic world," he said.

Mahaffey was suspended from University duties and recommended for dismissal Sept. 1, 1983, for professional incompetence. As a tenured faculty member, he appealed the action to Faculty Senate. Friday was the final day of that appeal hearing, which began Jan. 17.

Richard Seaton, University attorney, said in his closing statement the forestry department controversy had been brewing since 1977 and reached the point that something had to be done.

"None of us want to be here. But there's an important principle at stake here — the principle of a strong tenure system. If we are to have a strong tenure system, there's got to be the willingness to weed out those who don't belong," he said.

Seaton said he was surprised by the few discrepancies in witnesses' testimony.

"I thought we would have a great many discrepancies. When Dr. Mahaffey took the stand, he agreed with almost everything our witnesses said," he said.

The committee's charge, therefore, "is not what happened, but what effect it had," Seaton said.

Seaton told the committee that Gallaher had once tried in 1978 to resolve the department controversy and Mahaffey has also had every chance to resolve the problems. But Mahaffey was someone "without reverse gears, someone who would not acknowledge criticism and work on it."

"There's a serious problem in the forestry department, and that's what prompted the dismissal letter," Seaton said. "We believe they've been caused by Dr. Mahaffey and have rendered the department less able to carry out its duty, and it's not likely he will change in the future."

Schauner classified the University's argument as a "red herring argument about what's going to happen if Dr. Mahaffey goes back to the department." The University's case was repetitious, he said, with several people testifying about the same incidents.

Such repetition prompted Schauner to compare the case to a track runner with a hurdle every 10 yards. But instead of the hurdles being different from each other, they are the same hurdle just moved the 10 yards farther down the track.

Although the hearing had hundreds of pieces of evidence and hours of testimony, "unfortunately the one thing we did not have was someone who knew what was going on (in the forestry department). What we had was a lot of people who had listened to coffee shop talk and the departmental jungle drums," Schauner said.

Mahaffey, who was on the stand more than five hours Friday, said he realized in 1978 that department administrators were trying to take his job. Meeting with Gallaher in late October that year, he said he knew his job was in jeopardy after the meeting.

"I left the meeting and was very concerned. I knew the setup had begun," Mahaffey said.

Although he has been accused of threatening and swearing at Gallaher, Mahaffey denied the accusation but said Gallaher was an incompetent administrator with no experience dealing with teaching faculty. "He was a sick old man," he said, referring to Gallaher's extended absences in 1978 due to illness.

Mahaffey denied he ever swore or used the Lord's name in vain in the classroom or treated students unfairly, for which he has been accused of in student complaints since 1978.

Mahaffey recounted an October 1978 class incident which was referred to throughout the hearing as his "class tirade." Mahaffey said his class was reviewing a test when some students became upset with their grades. When Mahaffey wouldn't discuss a question's point value but only a question's answer, two students became upset and claimed Mahaffey was harassing them.

One student was "yelling at me from across the room saying 'you're harassing us.' I turned to him and said 'who's harassing whom,'" Mahaffey said.

In testimony last week, Ed Nilson, a former student now living in Kansas City, Mo., said that during the outbreak Mahaffey then turned from the first student to him and said "One more word out of you and you're

Senator talks on rights in El Salvador

Human rights violations in Central America were the main topic of a speech by Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum Jan. 28 in the Union Little Theater.

Kassebaum, co-sponsor of the bill requiring certification of progress in El Salvador for financial aid, addressed the question of human rights in Central America.

"I find it hard to know how you can judge whether progress is being made if during one month there are 200 deaths reported, and the next month there are only 100," she said. "If that is progress, then it is all right to give aid to these countries."

The United States has reached a point at which certification as a basis for economic aid is not serving a useful function, Kassebaum said.

"I think it is making hypocrites out of all concerned," she said.

Kassebaum said she does not favor increased aid to El Salvador. She said she believes the approximate $1.1 billion in aid given since 1980 has not proved successful.

"I am in favor of giving aid and assistance for health care, education and small businesses, but not for the military," she said. "I don't believe the aid we are giving is reaching the people who really need it."

Reagan announces re-election bid for presidency

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Ronald Wilson Reagan, 39th president of the United States, said in a paid political advertisement Sunday night that he will stand for re-election.

His long-expected campaign announcement came as 1,000 Republican officials gathered in a nearby hotel ballroom to cheer a candidate who is riding high in the polls and has already amassed a $4 million re-election war chest.

Eight men are chasing the Democratic nomination to oppose Reagan.

Reagan, who took office vowing to stem the tide of ever-increasing government spending and to rebuild the nation's military, was coy to the last, telling GOP officials early in the evening: "We'll trust that everything comes together before the night is over."

The former actor and governor, who will be 73 Feb. 6, announced his fourth bid for the presidency in a TV broadcast from the Oval Office.

The Reagan-Bush campaign committee paid about $400,000 to air Reagan's 10:55 p.m. EST announcement, but the money couldn't buy suspense.

Though Reagan refused for months to declare his intentions, arguing that early disclosure would prompt speculation that his decisions were colored by politics, he dropped many hints that he would run.

He made countless jokes about his age, defusing what has been a perennial non-issue. He lit into his Democratic opponents, focusing on frontrunner Walter Mondale.

He said George Bush again would be his running mate.

The chairman of Reagan's campaign, Sen. Paul Laxalt, said Democrats are "far better motivated, far better united than I've seen them in a while." He said that if former Vice President Mondale wins nomination, as he expects, Reagan will face a "united, hungry Democratic Party."

Major news media polls released last week generally gave Reagan higher ratings than at any time since he was shot and wounded on March 30, 1981.

The Reagan-Bush '84 organization has raised $4 million, and began paying for Reagan's political travel effective with a rally last Thursday.

Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum speaks to Amnesty International members Saturday in the Union.

federal death penalty bill currently being considered by the Senate.

"I believe capital punishment is needed. There are crimes for which this option is needed. I believe that a judge and jury should have this option to consider," Kassebaum said.

The presentation by Kassebaum concluded the day's activities of the Amnesty International midwest area meeting. Workshops were held Saturday morning and Doris Streiter, Amnesty International midwest regional director, spoke following Kassebaum.

Amnesty International is a worldwide organization founded in 1961. According to its literature, it works for the "the release of prisoners of conscience — men, women and children detained anywhere because of their beliefs, color, sex, ethnic origin, language or religion, provided they have neither used nor advocated violence."

Amnesty International also attempts to "obtain fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners and end torture and the death penalty in all cases."

The organization has 500,000 members in more than 150 countries. There are Amnesty International chapters in Manhattan, Salina, Wichita, Topeka, Lawrence and in Lindsborg.

Council to consider charge for denied ticket appeals

Implementing a $5 processing charge for denied appeals and discontinuing divided lot usage between faculty and staff and students are issues to be discussed at a Traffic and Parking Council meeting at 3:30 p.m. today in the Union.

According to a subcommittee proposal, the $5 charge would be used to discourage violators from using the appeals process to delay ticket payment. If the ticket and the $5 charge are not paid within two weeks of the denied appeal, an additional $5 late charge would be added.

The council also will consider discontinuing the practice of dividing lots for use between faculty and students. Three lots on campus — one south of Ackert Hall, one north of Waters Hall and one south of the Union — would be affected.

The proposal said the lots create confusion for motorists and high costs in sign implementation and maintenance.

Another change included in the proposal is to discontinue half-price discounts on faculty and staff permits for individuals with salaries of $10,000 or less. The proposal said that no other Big Eight Conference university allows discounted permits for individuals with less income.

Also included in the proposal is a plan to begin collecting charges for temporary parking permits and a 50-cent charge for persons attending conferences at K-State.

Another change to be discussed is the implementation of an evening permit at a rate of $10 per year for parking from 5 p.m. to 10 p.m., Monday through Friday. Daytime permits would then be considered valid until 10 p.m.

Candidates fail to file report

The Student Senate Elections Committee has ruled that three candidates for student body president will not have their names on the ballot because they failed to turn in their first expenditure report by the Jan. 23 deadline.

Presidential candidates taken off the ballot are Bruce Jacks, junior in engineering technology; Kent

"Jake" Jaecke, junior in animal sciences and industry and Eddie Rodriguez, sophomore in pre-law.

Julie Martin, chairman of the Elections Committee and senior in pre-nursing and life sciences, said the candidates may appeal the decision to the committee. If it upholds its decision, then the candidates may appeal to Tribunal.

Senior wins Marshall Scholarship

A K-State senior has been named the first K-State student ever to receive the Marshall Scholarship.

Daniel Robison, senior in natural resource management, is one of 30 winners from throughout the United States. As a Marshall scholar, Robison will receive expenses for tuition, living expenses and travel for two years of study in the United Kingdom. It is estimated that the scholarship is worth $16,000 per year.

Robison hopes to go to the University of Reading to learn about tropical soils. Ultimately, he plans to work in tropical soils and the relation they have to world hunger.

The Marshall Scholarships were established in 1953 as an expression of British gratitude for U.S. economic assistance instituted by Gen. George Marshall after World War II.

In November Robison was chosen as one of two Marshall nominees from K-State and in December was selected as one of only 20 candidates from a 12-state region to compete in interviews in Chicago.

The names of a small number of candidates were chosen in Chicago for the final stage of the Marshall scholar competition. The formal announcement of Robison's placement at a British university will be made soon by the British ambassador in Washington, D.C.

Acker salutes Kansas in Arizona

Improved economic conditions in Kansas, attention to the state's public education system, and new commercial and civic development in Kansas communities were featured by President Duane Acker in his remarks Saturday to former Kansans gathered in Sun City, Ariz., to celebrate "Kansas Day."

Acker drew attention to major capital developments underway in Kansas communities.

Acker told the former Kansans their home state was focusing its attention on all Kansas public education.

Assistant professor to study algae

James Guikema, assistant professor of biology, has been awarded a $44,000 research grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Science and Education, Cooperative State Research Service.

This grant provides funds for the study of the development of lipid-protein complexes of blue-green algae membranes. The goal of this study is to examine the structure of photosynthetic membranes using blue-green algae.

By analyzing the biosynthesis (formation of chemical compounds) of these complexes within the membranes of these blue-green algae, it will be possible to assess which proteins comprise these complexes and how the proteins interact with each other to allow lower and higher plants to carry out photosynthesis.

Committee examines home economics plan

The 15-member committee charged with investigating the possible merger of the College of Home Economics and the Division of Cooperative Extension's office of home economics has had its first meeting and has begun to examine documents which may help it make a decision.

Karen Penner, assistant professor of extension home economics and committee chairman, said the process of developing recommendations for the merger would continue through the semester.

"Right now we are basically in the information-gathering stage. We had our first informational meeting Thursday, and now we are beginning to look at data compiled from last year. We are also looking at drafts and documents of other schools to help us generate ideas. We are going to spend a lot of time studying this (the merger possibility), while looking at other universities and then determining what is right for K-State and Kansas home economics," Penner said.

Members of the College of Home Economics and Extension Home

Economics are devising these recommendations to maximize the functions of each and to bring everyone closer together, Penner said in an earlier interview.

"We have a lot of diverse people on the committee, and everyone needs to have an understanding of what extension is and does. This can not be accomplished overnight," she said.

The committee is comprised of Norton County Extension Office representatives, Kansas extension specialists at the state and local levels, representatives from the Kansas Extension Homemakers Council, the K-State Home Economics Alumni Association and department heads and faculty from the Colleges of Home Economics and Agriculture.

Extension Home Economics serves a purpose of which many students and faculty are unaware, Penner said.

"The function of extension home economics is to educate the people who are not taking classes at the University — this is done by having federal, state and local ties," she said.

out." Mahaffey denied making the statement.

"I said 'Continued outbursts like that and I'll ask you to leave the class,'" Mahaffey said. "Things quieted down real quick after that."

"I never did apologize to the class and don't know why I didn't. I guess I was too proud," he said.

Mahaffey, who has also been accused of co-authoring a student paper which was critical of the forestry department administration's attempt at obtaining a Pepsi vending machine for Call Hall, denied the charge.

"I wrote none of it. I don't write my students' papers," he said. "I'll admit I had an ulterior motive — I wanted a Pepsi machine — but I said let's also learn from this experience."

Mahaffey came to K-State in 1972, under what he called a "philosophical agreement" to form a natural resource management department. Working closely with College of Agriculture Dean Carol Hess, Mahaffey said he reported more to Hess than the head of the Department of Horticulture-Forestry.

Hired on a full teaching schedule in the natural resource management curriculum with no research commitments, Mahaffey said no one questioned him his first few years because of the rapid growth of the NRM curriculum.

Problems for Mahaffey and the NRM curriculum began when Hess left on a two-year sabbatical to the Philippines in 1977. Hess was the curriculum's major backer, Mahaffey said, and worked out any problems that developed.

When Hess took his sabbatical, the forestry faculty of horticulture-forestry was split from the department and added to extension forestry to form the current Department of Forestry. Mahaffey was now reporting to Gallaher and he said David Mugler, the agriculture college's associate dean and director of resident instruction, was not aware of the working relationship the NRM curriculum had had with Hess.

At its peak, the NRM curriculum was the fourth largest curriculum in the agriculture college, larger than some departments, Mahaffey said.

Mahaffey said he knew of no good definition for the term "sexist," but denied he was and said he never made the comment "women weren't good one week out of the month."

"What I probably was referring to was that in certain types of work which has heavy lifting or requires being constantly alert, like operating heavy equipment, some women may faint like they do in their menstrual cycles. You have to take that into consideration," he said.

Using a 20-minute slide show at the end of his direct testimony to illustrate the NRM curriculum, Mahaffey said his goal for the curriculum was to give students the opportunity to work with "high-quality materials." Demanding excellence from students is essential, he said, because if they don't learn what excellence is in college, where will they?

"Where nothing is demanded, nothing is given," he said.

According to the committee's guidelines established by Faculty Senate, the appeal committee has no deadline to finish its recommendation report to K-State President Duane Acker. The recommendation will reflect a majority decision of the committee and will not be made available to the public unless Mahaffey releases it himself.

Hotel's cracked main beam poses no immediate danger

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Repairs on a cracked main support beam at the Westin Crown Center hotel started this weekend as 108 of the hotel's 724 rooms remained closed as a safety precaution.

Engineers and city officials who examined the crack have determined that it posed no immediate danger. A monitoring device was placed near the crack to detect any changes in the structure.

Crews from the J.E. Dunn Construction Co. did rough preparation work this weekend on a rock shelf under the hotel for installation of temporary shoring timbers.

No deadline for completion of the work had been set, said Robert A. Kipp, president of Crown Center Redevelopment Corp., which owns that hotel and the nearby Hyatt Regency hotel.

The collapse of two skywalks at the Hyatt Regency in 1981 killed 114 people and injured about 200 others.

A crack was discovered in a 36-inch-deep steel I-beam at the Westin Crown Center last week by engineers hired by Crown Center to examine the 17-building Crown Center complex. Engineers said the crack appeared to be related to welding work.

Teachers sacrifice duties to hear case

By TODD NIGHSWONGER
Collegian Reporter

The Ben Mahaffey hearing caused six faculty members to temporarily give up their teaching duties for two weeks to serve on the hearing committee.

Mahaffey, associate professor of forestry, is appealing his Sept. 1, 1983, suspension and recommended dismissal from University duties.

During this two-week period, the committee members' classes were taught by graduates and fellow instructors. Richard Gallagher, professor of electrical engineering and Faculty Senate president, said.

Gallagher said prior arrangements were made to cover the committee's classes for only one week.

"This week (the second week) there was a continuation of juggling instructors around," he said.

The committee members are Chairman Peter Cooper, professor of civil engineering; Fred Appl, professor of mechanical engineering; George Milliken, professor of statistics; Robert Newhouse, professor of administration and foundations; Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics; and James Shanteau, professor of psychology.

In Appl's case, other faculty members assisted with his classes. Paul Miller, head of the mechanical engineering department, said. In one instance, a temporary instructor's duties were increased.

"We (the mechanical engineering department) had to increase the appointment time of a temporary instructor," Miller said.

He said he has not received any formal complaints from students in Appl's classes.

Nafziger teaches two classes, one which met for 25 minutes each class period and the other which did not meet at all during the hearing.

The first class, an 8:30 a.m. class, met until 8:55 a.m., at which time Nafziger dismissed class to attend the hearing at 9 a.m. The other class, a 10:30 a.m. graduate level course, did not meet at all because no else is qualified to teach it, Nafziger said.

Gallagher said he believes the hearing was a serious function as a service to the University — one which would continue to be a top priority until a decision was reached, and that the six faculty members' presence was "very important."

Nafziger said he agrees with the significance of the hearing despite the fact that his classes had to be shortened or cancelled.

"The only way you can justify it (dismissing classes) is that the importance of the hearing outweighs the damage of the class not being held," he said.

Phase I of Weber renovation begins this year

By LINDA MORRELL
Collegian Reporter

Modern practices and increased technology used in the animal science industry have led to planned changes of Weber Hall.

"There haven't been many major changes since Weber was built in the 1950s," said Melvin Hunt, associate professor of animal sciences and industry and chairman of the Weber Hall Building and Renovation Committee.

The animal sciences department is like other University departments in that the number of students and faculty has increased, he said.

"We've outgrown our existing facilities," he said.

The Board of Regents has approved the first phase of the project, Hunt said, which includes renovation funds for 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Phase I includes $113,500 for the pre-planning stage in fiscal year 1984.

As part of this pre-planning, an architectural firm from Lawrence, Gould-Evans Partnership, has been hired by the state.

They are to determine how to coordinate moves to and from Weber and Call Halls and are to establish what parts of Weber can be renovated and added to, Hunt said.

K-State has hired a consulting firm, Epstein and Son, from Chicago, which has expertise in meat inspection and facility planning areas, Hunt said.

The firms' studies and the committee report will not be completed until this spring, Hunt said.

The regents' plan allots $99,500 for fiscal year 1985 for a detailed design of the renovation.

An additional $1,787,500 in fiscal year 1986 has been allotted for the actual renovation.

Gov. John Carlin's capital improvement recommendation for Phase II of the project has not been approved by the regents yet, Hunt said.

Carlin's plan allows $262,500 for addition plans for Weber in fiscal year 1987.

Another $4,934,755 is set aside in Carlin's plan for construction in fiscal years 1988-89.

The total amount of funds for each phase is 16 percent less than the department hoped for, said Don Good, head of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

"Hopefully, (the increase in) the training of young men and women, conducting research and extending research to the community will become a reality," Good said.

The renovation and building program specifically involves utilizing or maximizing existing space in Phase I, Hunt said.

Phase II includes a meat lab and additional research labs for different disciplines, he said.

"Particularly in the meat industry, technological changes in treatment and processes are different than 20 years ago," Hunt said.

Changes have also been seen in the inspection and building requirements for lab facilities, he said. Teaching facilities will also be renovated or added, he said.

"We are taking a logical, economically sound approach (to the project)," Hunt said. "Either of these phases may be modified. We want to do it without wasting money."

The project is "proceeding well, and we anticipate everything will be on schedule," Gene Cross, vice president of University Facilities, said.

Turning the airwaves blue

Last week the Federal Communications Commission issued a position report which will spare us, the innocent viewers, from Larry Flynt's plans to "turn the airwaves blue" during this campaign season. The illustrious Flynt, publisher of the highly esteemed Hustler Magazine, is a 1984 presidential contender. (Surprised? Well, his campaign has been slowed a little while he's been in prison.)

Flynt had big plans for the broadcast media, stemming from the FCC's "equal time" requirement: if a particular station sells air time to one contender, it must offer equal time to the others, and it must offer it at its lowest rate. More important, the station can't censor political advertisements.

Enter Flynt, who announced he was going to use his equal time to emit epithets of less-than-puritanical nature to turn the airwaves blue.

Two things could have happened here. 1) Stations, not wishing to air that kind of filth, might have refused to sell time to anyone, just to keep Flynt off the air. 2) Mommy and Daddy and the kids might have sat down, unsuspecting, to the A-Team and then sat through five minutes of a Flynt X-rated "political announcement."

Last week the FCC issued its opinion that a station's imperative not to broadcast obscenities overrides a campaigner's right to have his advertisements shown unedited. Obscenities lack serious political value, they said, so prohibiting broadcast of them does not adversely affect freedom of political expression. The FCC's decision will certainly make the matter of political advertising less complicated this season, but at the same time it raises some serious questions.

Where political communication is involved, is it ever completely safe to give the power of prior censorship to the media, even if it only pertains to obscenity or profanity? As the Supreme Court has discovered, there are many definitions of what is obscene. The media will now have more control, even though to a seemingly small degree, over the presentation of political issues, and there is always a potential danger there. It's OK to breathe a little sigh of relief, but don't shut your eyes while you're doing it.

Civil rights — political playthings?

Protection of civil rights in the United States is becoming a thing of the past.

Enforcement of civil rights was once assumed to be an issue above politics. In November, however, when President Reagan fired three members of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, civil rights enforcement became a victim of partisan politics.

Last week, the commission denounced use of the quota system as a means of correcting effects of racial discrimination. Previous commissions had supported the use of racial quotas as a last resort in cases of proven discrimination.

Why did the commission reverse the policy of previous commissions? After the November shake-up, Reagan changed the number of commissioners from five to eight and appointed six new members. The vote was 6-2 against the quota system.

Reagan has a long record of opposition to enforcing the goals of equal opportunity. In 1964, he opposed the enactment of the Federal Civil Rights law; only 40 other Republicans in both houses took that stand. In 1966, he opposed the fair housing bill in California. In 1980, he insisted the Republican platform disapprove of busing for racial integration and quotas for schools and businesses.

The quota system is not the major issue. Good arguments may be made both for and against the use of racial quotas. But the fate of the quota system shows Reagan administration influence on the commission.

The purpose of the commission is to watch for civil rights violations and determine the best way to correct them. A balanced commission would have a wide range of ideas on how to correct violations. The present commission, however, has limited its options to those approved of by the conservative administration.

The trend away from civil rights protection can be reversed. Reagan is looking ahead to the 1984 presidential elections. If concerned voters put pressure on Reagan, he may make changes in his civil rights policies.

But changing Reagan's policies is not enough. Steps should be taken to assure the commission never again becomes the mouthpiece for a president's policies. The commission should be an independent organization, answerable only to the Congress. The Congress, not the president, should have the power to appoint and remove members. Then the cause of civil rights can be served.

Bloom County

By Berke Breathed

Goodbye, Art Brisbane

I'm losing a mentor and I don't know what to do.

Arthur S. Brisbane, columnist for the Kansas City Times, is leaving the "cowtown" to work for the Washington Post.

For some of you, this announcement probably doesn't hold any meaning. You're probably wondering who I'm talking about, or else you may not care. I can't blame you; up until two years ago, I didn't know who the guy was.

For others, you know what I'm saying. Brisbane's columns are witty and pointed. His latest series, involving the Jackson County (Mo.) Legislature, has taken "The Curly Shuffle" as a theme. Basically, Brisbane is fun to read.

One thing I like about Brisbane's writings is that he is part of each column. I haven't met him, yet I think I know him. He is like the neighborhood pal — always looking at a serious situation with satirical wisdom.

But Brisbane writes more than satire. Because of his column, I have learned about the parts of Kansas City which many people don't see — the cafes near the stockyards and industrial areas of town; the people who aren't as famous as George Brett or Ed Neely, yet are as colorful as any legend.

Brisbane doesn't know it, but he influenced me to become a columnist. I'm not sure if it's good or bad, but it's true.

While I was in Reporting 2, I wrote two columns "just for grins." Columns are fun to write, because you get to share parts of your life with strangers. If the columnist is lucky, the strangers like his work and keep reading it. If he has thick skin and a sense of humor, the columnist can take a bad experience and learn something from it.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

In other words, you've got to be nuts to write a column.

Don't take that statement wrong. I mean it in a positive sense. Any time you put yourself on the line and decide to keep doing it, you've made a giant step toward either glory or humiliation — or both. It takes a special kind of person to do this every day. I'm still struggling to find the right mixture to improve my writing.

Art Brisbane has the "magic formula" for writing columns.

Oh, there are other columnists who have the "right stuff." Mike Royko, Chicago Tribune columnist, has it. So do William Buckley, James J. Kilpatrick, Ellen Goodman, William Safire, James Reston and many other well-known columnists. I just like Brisbane's columns best.

Writing editorials is also challenging. Editorials are usually written in the third-person. The ability to write on a one-to-one basis, like a chat, is lost in editorial writing.

Columns, like editorials, can be thought pieces. Buckley's columns are fascinating. He has excellent command of the English language. I enjoy reading his work just so I can learn new words and phrases. Buckley, unfortunately, sometimes is too challenging to read. I can handle only so much of Buckley's work at one time before becoming lost.

I like Brisbane's columns because he writes on a one-to-one basis. I don't feel blinded by his work, even though Brisbane's command of the language is excellent. I can't read the Times without reading his column.

I have disagreed with Brisbane's point of view a few times. He once wrote a column about his favorite and least favorite foods. He wrote that he dislikes biscuits and gravy and didn't understand what made the dish a local favorite. Easy, I thought, just ask any truck driver. The secret is to use a lot of pepper.

With Brisbane leaving the Times, I wonder who will replace him. It's like losing a good friend and guide.

I hope his column becomes syndicated. It would be interesting to see what he writes about the nation's capital. If all goes well, maybe someone could write a movie about him — "Art Brisbane Goes to Washington."

All I want to say to Art Brisbane is thanks for being a mentor. I won't forget what you've taught me during the past two years. Even though you didn't know it, you've helped me become a better writer and thinker. For that, I extend my gratitude.

Good luck in Washington, Art. Keep the nation's leaders on their toes.

Alice's Restaurant revisited

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant.

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant.

Just come right in it's around the back.

Just a half a mile from the railroad track.

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant.

That Arlo Guthrie classic about his encounter with a small-town judicial system just about sums up how I feel right now.

At this writing, I have just returned from a trip to Manhattan Municipal Court. That's right. I'm a criminal — charged with willfully and wantonly parking in one of those 2 a.m. to 9 a.m. no parking zones.

I arrived at City Hall early. I expected City Prosecutor Bob Pottroff to be ready to listen to my complaint. Unfortunately, arraignments were running late, so I was relegated to the chairs outside the courtroom.

You see, it all started a couple of Friday mornings ago when I returned from work about 2:30 a.m. Like the decent, law-abiding citizen I am, I drove through my apartment parking lot looking for a space. For the first time since I've lived there, no spaces were available. Because I had never needed to park in the street, I didn't have one of the permits the city uses to try to keep people from storing cars on streets.

I drove the surrounding streets searching in vain for a place to park that wasn't included in the no parking zone. After that proved futile, I parked right in front of my apartment complex, locked the car, went inside and went to bed.

LEE WHITE

The next day, I went out to the car and found the ticket. It had been written about 8:40 a.m. by an officer who probably couldn't understand why I parked in the street because of all the spaces in the lot that had no doubt opened up by then.

Anyway, when I went to court, the place was packed. Judge Patrick Caffey and Pottroff were racing back and forth across the hall carrying tons of paperwork.

Finally, about 40 minutes after I arrived, the court clerk came out and told me that Pottroff had read my statement, determined it wasn't a valid excuse and wouldn't dismiss the charge.

What could I do? I was late for everything, so I forfeited the $15 bond and left.

What is a good excuse for parking in a restricted zone? Probably nothing. With the lack of judicial discretion in this town, you might as well pay your fine. They'll get the money out of you one way or the other.

The reason this situation makes my blood boil is that other, more serious charges have been dismissed all because of social stature.

I don't have anyone working for the University who can go to Pottroff and plead my case for me. I don't have an adviser who has the power to set up a neighborhood liaison program to see that I don't park in a no parking zone. If I'm charged with urinating or defecating in public, I pay the fine.

Of course, Pottroff can argue that this is my landlord's fault. I fail to believe that. This was an isolated problem. It had never happened before and probably will never happen again. And my landlord isn't a lawyer, an adviser or a fraternity house president.

So the next time you get a parking ticket you think you don't deserve, just walk into Pottroff's office and sing:

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant.

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant (excepting Alice).

Just come right in it's around the back.

Just a half a mile from the railroad track.

You can get anything you want at Alice's restaurant.

And then walk out. After awhile, he'll think it's a movement. That's what it is. Mr. Guthrie, your point is well taken.

Student group to aid campus police

Students interested in law enforcement have the opportunity to get first-hand experience through a new K-State program — Students Concerned Assisting Law Enforcement.

SCALE is being organized in an effort to assist the K-State Police in providing a safe campus for students, faculty, staff and visitors.

"We've kicked this idea around for some time," Lt. James Tubach said. "We've finally found someone interested enough to be a sponsor for it."

That someone is Steve Hall, assistant university registrar. Hall was involved with a similar group while working at Northwest Missouri State University in Maryville, Miss.

"I am very enthusiastic about this organization and its purpose," Hall said. "I think it's a worthy cause and I'm honored to help — I enjoy working with students who are concerned about other students."

The main purpose of SCALE is to serve the constituencies of K-State, including: general campus assistance for students, faculty, staff and visitors; escort service on request from classes, meetings, activities and libraries to residence halls during nighttime hours; crowd assistance for athletic and other major K-State functions; information and directions to campus-based activities and facilities; and assistance in insuring security for campus parking areas.

Any K-State student is eligible to become a member of SCALE, regardless of sex, race, religious faith or national origin. However, the number of students each semester will be limited to 35.

Applications will be accepted at the beginning of each spring semester. Those who apply must be in good academic standing, maintain a minimum cumulative grade point average of 2.5 and agree to consent to a background check by the campus police.

A committee comprised of the chief of police or his representative, the faculty adviser and three current SCALE members appointed by the general membership will make the final selection of new members.

SCALE officers will consist of a president, vice president, recorder and treasurer. They will be elected during the second week of each fall semester and will serve a one-year academic term.

Meetings will be held on the first Wednesday of each month at 7:30 p.m. in the campus police offices in the southeast corner of East Stadium.

"Hopefully this will be a way to build up better relations between students and law enforcement," Tubach said.

Library provides references through computer systems

Compiling references does not have to be a chore — it is as easy as walking into Farrell Library and filling out a form. A computer "searches" for the information and returns the desired list of references.

Two computerized searching services are now available to students — Online Search Services (OSS) and QUEST.

OSS is available to graduate students and faculty in conjunction with a subsidy program that will pay the $15 fee necessary for one search run for a graduate student during a fiscal year period (July to June). Faculty members are eligible for three $10 subsidies during a fiscal year.

Through the OSS, access is possible to as many data bases as are necessary. Over 200 are available in a variety of subject areas — particularly in the social and natural sciences.

Undergraduates may also use the OSS, although they are not eligible for the subsidy program.

"To have a search run, patrons come to the library, pick up a form at the reference desk, fill it out and are then put in contact with the librarian responsible for running searches in that discipline," said Dwayne Schrag, coordinator of reference and informational services. "We require the patron to be present when the search is run because decisions must be made while online, depending on the number of bibliographical citations retrieved."

The computer is connected to a larger system in Palo Alto, Calif., which searches and transmits the information back to Farrell.

"The primary advantage of OSS is that it takes a family of two or more synonymous terms and combines them in a short span of time."

QUEST, a free service, is available only to undergraduate students. It is a newer program which was begun in September as an extension of the reference desk.

The requirement for doing a search of this type is that there must be at least two concepts or families of terms involved.

Saunas become hot item at recreation center

Many K-State students have been sweating it out before they exercise since last semester's installation of saunas at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Complex.

"The saunas have received an overwhelming response from students, but precautions still need to be observed while using them," Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said. "Students need to utilize the saunas before they exert themselves in exercise. By having attendants monitoring the saunas at intervals, incidents such as people staying in them past the 20-minute period and passing out is unlikely."

Robel said the primary purpose of a sauna is to relax muscles and alleviate muscle soreness.

"It (the sauna) is not a quick method of weight reduction. Persons with high blood pressure or heart conditions should consult their doctors before using the sauna," he said.

Robel said the installation of saunas was chosen over jacuzzis due to the saunas' lower maintenance cost.

"Jacuzzis would have been harder and more expensive to maintain with the replacement of parts to the water pumps," Robel said. "Jacuzzis require various chemicals to keep them properly sanitized."

"The once-popular craze of jacuzzis is currently being criticized by several medical authorities for various health reasons. Future installation of jacuzzis depends primarily on whether there is a sufficient need, and if funds become available," Robel said.

The saunas were paid for through an improvement fund.

"Every so often money is set aside in an improvement fund," Robel said. "We determine what improvements would be beneficial to the Rec Complex and review how much funds are available in the improvement fund."

"Students and individuals who possess recreation cards are allowed to use the saunas during regular recreation hours. Our hours are pretty extended with the Rec Complex staying open later," he said.

Palestinians protest shrine incident

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops imposed a curfew on two West Bank areas Sunday after Palestinians protested a thwarted attack on the Al-Aqsa Mosque, one of Islam's holiest shrines, sources said.

The military sources said troops fired tear gas into crowds of stone-throwing demonstrators at the central market of Nablus and the nearby Balatta refugee camp, then sealed off the two areas.

On Friday, men with guns and grenades tried to break into the Jerusalem shrine where the Koran says the Prophet Mohammed prayed before ascending to heaven.

Police picked up four men but released them after failing to get a solid lead on the mastermind.

Justice Minister Moshe Nissim said Israel would "spare no effort" to identify the assailants.

Arab guards saw at least two men trying to scale the walls of the Temple Mount, which is known to Arabs as Harim El-Sharif, enclosing Al-Aqsa and the Dome of the Rock Shrine. Both men fled, leaving what Jerusalem Police Chief Yehoshua Caspi said were enough explosives to cause many casualties and heavy damage.

The Temple Mount, revered by Jews as the site of King Solomon's Temple, is a frequent flashpoint of tension. Past attacks there triggered riots in the West Bank and protests from the Arab world.

In 1982 U.S. immigrant Alan Goodman charged into the area firing an automatic rifle, killing a Moslem guard and wounding nine others; he got life imprisonment. Last year, police disrupted an apparent plot by Jewish extremists to seize the area, but a court acquitted 29 suspects for lack of evidence. There were no convictions.

Junction City man dies in wreck

JUNCTION CITY — A Junction City man was killed Sunday morning when his pickup truck crashed through a bridge guardrail and fell into the Smokey Hill River, about three miles east of Junction City, the Kansas Highway Patrol reported.

The victim was identified as Leonard R. DeHerrera, 23.

The truck plunged about 40 feet into the river, and the victim was thrown into the water.

Diana's dress rated a success

LONDON — Princess Diana, "an undoubted queen in the making," has had a major impact on fashion with her stylish clothes and has changed Britons' attitude toward the royal family, says the author of "The Princess of Wales Fashion Handbook."

The princess, who is regularly featured in the fashion pages of British newspapers and magazines, has been praised by a succession of fashion designers for her individual dress style, writes author Sue James. The book's publication date is today.

"It's sometimes thought that Diana has it all done for her," says James, fashion editor of Woman's Own magazine.

"This turns out to be far from the truth. Diana is a young lady with her own very definite taste, and with very positive views about clothes."

Diana, who married Prince Charles, heir to the British throne, in 1981, "has achieved a remarkable transformation, from teen-age girl to elegant woman...in a remarkably short space of time," James said.

Country music takes to the sea

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Country music singer Hank Williams Jr. will film a television special Feb. 14 aboard the aircraft carrier USS Constellation in San Diego.

"To my knowledge this is the first time that a country music special has been filmed entirely aboard an aircraft carrier," said Dan Wojcik, president of the booking agency representing Williams.

Williams' guests on the show are to be Alabama, Waylon Jennings, Sylvia, Gus Hardin and Mel McDaniels.

Wojcik said negotiations are under way with network, cable and syndicated television systems to present the show.

In announcing details Friday, officials said they expect the show to be filmed before a live audience of 10,000.

Williams, the son of a country music legend, is known for his hits, "All My Rowdy Friends," "Old Habits," "Family Tradition," "Honky Tonk Blues," "Texas Women" and "Dixie on My Mind."

Star's visit fuels Nebraska rumors

OMAHA, Neb. — Actress Debra Winger has fueled rumors about her relationship with Gov. Bob Kerrey by making another trip to the Cornhusker state.

Winger met Kerrey while filming the highly acclaimed movie "Terms of Endearment" in Lincoln and they have been seen together often in the past several months.

Winger showed up Friday at Omaha Steaks International, where Kerrey was touring the mail-order meat business.

The couple appeared Friday night at a fund-raising party for James Munnely, who is seeking re-election to the Nebraska Public Service Commission.

Munnely said it was "a quite unexpected surprise" when the governor arrived with Winger.

Son bids with piggy bank money

Farmer loses equipment at auction

By The Associated Press

HILL CITY — An embattled farmer whose plight drew the notice of a presidential candidate has lost most of his agriculture equipment at a forced sale, despite other farmers' protests and his son's attempt to save the machinery with piggy-bank money.

Eleven-year-old Tito Bates waved a shiny penny from his piggy bank during the court-ordered auction Saturday, but his bid was rejected as auction officials set a $25 minimum for the 18 pieces of equipment from Bernard and Ava Bates' family farm.

"I was going to bid a penny, then try to bid a buck," Tito said.

A member of the American Agricultural Movement accused the bidders of "cannibalism."

About 125 farmers showed up at the sale to bid or protest, and Democratic presidential candidate the Rev. Jesse Jackson sent a telegram of support to the family.

Bernard Bates' father, Alvin Bates, 81, bought five of the smaller pieces of equipment the family will need to grow wheat and raise cows this year at Nicodemus, an all-black farming community in western Kansas.

The elder Bates also plans to share his own equipment with his son.

In July, a Graham County District Court judge ordered the equipment and 240 acres of land owned by the Bateses to be sold. Court documents showed the Bateses had about $300,000 in outstanding loans before the land was sold for $98,144 in November to the Stockton National Bank. Bates has one year to buy back the land at the sale price and says he will try to do so.

The Bateses still have 600 acres of land in the Nicodemus community, founded in 1877 by emancipated slaves. They plan to continue farming while they reorganize their debts under Chapter 11 bankruptcy provisions.

The equipment, which included a tractor, combine, seed drill, planter, plow, baler and livestock trailer, was sold for $40,000.

Members of the American Agriculture Movement were on hand to protest the sale.

"It's cannibalism — one farmer gobbling up another," said AAM spokesman Darrell Ringer of Quinter. "It doesn't take much of a man to kick a man when he's down."

Quinter added, "A lot of times when people get to this point they feel guilty. They think maybe they could have been better managers, that it's their fault. They're whipped."

"But the Bateses are still fighting. Bernard is a survivor."

The protesting farmers were mostly silent. Many sported red bandanna armbands, AAM caps and placards with slogans such as: "The sale you stop could be your own."

Mrs. Bates said she had hoped no one would bid on the machinery.

"We sure can't farm our ground if we don't have machinery," she said.

"We don't need our neighbors buying our equipment. Farmers need to stick together. We're trying to appeal to their common decency."

"Some people are concerned because they are going through the same things, but some people are unconcerned," Mrs. Bates added. "They think it can't happen to them."

But one bidder, Richard King, said, "I'm in sad shape, too. I haven't had a crop in four years."

Jackson had issued a plea to stop the foreclose last year. His telegram to the Bateses on Saturday said, "It is totally unacceptable that this nation's farmers, the most productive in the world, are being driven from the land."

Jackson promised that if elected president, "I will call a moratorium on farm foreclosures and a complete investigation into the farm credit system."

Soaps

Bubbling with viewers

Tom Selleck, Rick Springfield, Elizabeth Taylor and Sammy Davis Jr. have something in common besides stardom and fame. They've all appeared on soap operas.

The "soap" industry is big business today, with more than 70 million Americans watching them on television, according to a recent article in "Time" magazine.

Many K-State students stop whatever they're doing when it is time to watch their soaps each weekday, hoping to discover if Liz will recover from amnesia and remember that it's Neil, not Don, whom she loves.

When people gather to watch their favorite daytime serials, the group is usually very silent as they concentrate on the screen. Occasionally, complaints or remarks of disappointment are heard when a story line takes a new direction.

Stephanie Jones, freshman in biology, watches "All My Children" every day she can, she admitted as she sat in front of the television in Ford Hall with about 15 other women.

"Soaps give you an escape from your own problems by allowing you to get involved with everyone else's problems. Everyone else's lives (in the programs) are so messed up compared to yours," Jones said.

Despite common stereotypes, men are not immune to the fascination of watching soap operas.

Mike Lueker, sophomore in accounting, said he has been watching soaps for years.

"I've watched soap operas since I was a little kid because my mom watched them. She got me hooked on them," he said.

What exactly is it about soap operas that lure viewers to the television set each day? As Jones explained, the escape factor is one reason for the soaps' popularity.

"Some people get into them because of the story line, and others find them so idiotic that they think they're entertaining. I think they're entertaining to watch and usually kind of funny," Michael Jones, sophomore in modern languages, said. He said he has watched "The Young and the Restless" and "The Guiding Light" for two years.

"People are having more problems than ever, so they want to see a lot of other people's problems so they won't think about their own," Lueker said.

If television viewers could be categorized, perhaps they would be divided into three groups — pro-soapers, so-so-soapers and no-soapers.

The pro-soapers are very involved with their soaps, and will go to extremes to watch each episode.

"I skipped class to see Laura's return to 'General Hospital,'" Sheryl Godby, junior in marketing, said. Godby said she watches "General Hospital" during the school year, "Days of Our Lives" in the summer and "The Young and the Restless" all year.

So-so-soapers display a much more casual attitude toward the shows.

"Soap operas never come first, at least for me they don't," Margaret Price, sophomore in early childhood development, said. "When someone asks me what I'm doing today, I never think, 'Watch soap operas.'"

A no-soaper, Annette Martin, freshman in pre-physical therapy, said she currently doesn't watch soaps and doesn't plan to watch them in the future. Martin, like many other no-soapers, said she doubts the realism of soap operas.

Others said they think soaps are based on reality, but story lines tend to be exaggerated. Theories on the realism of soaps are as varied as the people who watch them.

"I'd say they're more realistic than most people think, or than they would like to think. The problems themselves are realistic, but not all the things that happen in one year to a soap opera character happen to a person in real life," Lueker said.

"I think the story lines are a bit contrived, but the emotions are real," Michael Jones said.

Opinions differ about why soaps are so popular. Whatever the reasons may be, the soap industry will probably continue to thrive as long as there are curious viewers.

Has Betsy finally chosen Steve over Craig? Will Paula try to kill Clarissa again? Will John find out that Jill, his wife, is pregnant with his son's baby? Is Steve fighting Craig because of Jill? Or because of Betsy? Or Erica? Or Brooke?

Tune in tomorrow.

Tom Cummings, senior in marketing, relaxes in front of the television to watch one of the many daytime dramas appearing each afternoon.

Soap opera takes toll on creators

Daytime TV writing 'very demanding'

Staff/Rob Clark Jr.

Ashley Abbot pauses before accepting an engagement proposal by Eric on the "Young and the Restless" as members from the Alpha Delta Phi sorority look on.

As a senior writer for the television show "The Young and the Restless," Kay Alden, former Hutchinson resident, works a minimum of 12 hours per day, seven days a week.

"There's a certain number of shows that you do, but you do pay for it. It's very demanding work," she said.

Daytime television writers are responsible for developing about 260 shows a year, while nighttime television writers may have only 39 shows, Alden said.

Alden works for William Bell, creator and head writer for "The Young and the Restless." Before working on "The Young and the Restless," Bell worked 10 years on "As the World Turns" and more than 10 years on "Days of Our Lives."

"We write two out of every five shows in script form," Alden said.

As creator of the show, Bell plans the characters' activities in each episode, Alden said.

"The Young and the Restless" does not change writers often. Alden, who will have been with the show for 10 years in March, said it is an advantage to have continuity.

"You can't have the consistency when you change writers frequently. If other shows change writers, it's probably because of the demanding pressures of getting a script out every day," Alden said.

"Daytime (television writing) is not easy. Sometimes it seems to me that it is harder than it should be. The scenes, compared to anything else, seem very easy and natural. But the way people talk is an art in itself," she said.

Daytime television also takes its toll on the performers, Alden said.

The performers have almost no other life besides the show because of the extraordinary demands, she said.

"There's memorization. No other schedule in the business is like it. They may work from 6 a.m. to very late at night," she said.

Writers are hired with the understanding they will be writing for all the characters, Alden said, but each writer tends to write certain characters.

"You try and capitalize on any writer's greatest strengths," she said. "Right now I'm working on some characters that I haven't written on for months."

Soap opera story lines take many different twists. Alden said the writers often develop ideas from real-life events.

"That's not to say they're (story lines) translated directly, but the nature of circumstances may be borrowed (from life)," she said. "One thing about daytime television, it is in many respects related to life."

Alden said other ideas come only from the writer's imagination.

"In terms of rejecting an idea because it is not realistic enough, that would probably not happen. No matter what you do, you find someone who will say, 'That's my story.'"

The writers ask themselves if the audience is interested in an idea and if the idea is fantasy, escape, entertainment or involvement, she said.

"We consider the drama (in writing), but don't violate the truth," she said.

Sometimes story lines are written around the characters, and in other instances the character's behavior is written into the story lines, Alden said.

"It works both ways. There are things that occur to you to do with certain characters because of who the characters are. But one of the most fascinating things you can do in daytime (television writing), after you know who your character is and what they're capable of, is to come up with unexpected behavior," Alden said.

"We want to have characters so well defined, but still be able to catch them (the audience) off guard. But, it must be within the realm of possibility," she said.

Alden began working in the soap opera business after attending the University of Wisconsin. She was working on her dissertation topic, soap operas as a medium of social change, when she interviewed with Bell. She said she is still fascinated by viewer involvement, and the bond between the viewers and soap opera characters can be very strong.

Alden said one thing that contributes to viewers' addiction to soap operas is the form of the medium.

Historically, serial programs have been very popular because people like to know what's going to happen next. With soaps, the viewer doesn't have to wait until the next week to see what comes next, they can tune in the next day, she said.

The basic theme of soap operas is relationships — what happens among people — and this is another reason viewers continue to watch soaps, Alden said.

"Look at 'General Hospital' and Luke and Laura (characters of the show). That story exemplified every young woman's fantasy. The two were chemical together. It was the epitome of the perfect love story. Whatever else that was playing was backdrop," Alden said.

With today's economic hardships, people turn to soap operas as a means of escape. People want to deal with less pain and more stories that aren't so close to real life, Alden said.

Writers, as well as viewers, become attached to soap characters.

"When I am writing, these people become very real to me. As you work more and more, you get to the point where you hear their voices. When I'm writing their parts, I say them out loud or hear them out loud. I act it out. I'll cry in an emotional scene. If my emotions can't be tapped, there's something wrong with the scene," Alden said.

"These characters are with you all the time. Of course, I know they're characters, but, I'm aware of the character and where the characters are in a story," she said.

"Even while I'm on vacation going shopping, the characters might be on my mind, and I'll say, 'Now, that dress would look perfect on Jill,' or 'That's a Kay Chancellor dress,'" Alden said.

The soap opera industry has a healthy competitiveness in the ratings, Alden said.

"General Hospital" has been the clear leader in the past two to three years. ABC has been a very successful network in the past few years," she said.

"We were No. 1 for some time before we went to the hour," Alden said of "The Young and the Restless," adding that the writers want to be first in the ratings again.

In recent years there has been a move to re-define or re-group characters to capture a younger audience, Alden said.

"This is true mainly of CBS because it has some of the older shows, but it's certainly fair to say virtually every show has made significant changes to attract viewers," she said.

"CBS began to push a number of their older shows to entice more of the younger audience when, through demographic research, it discovered its viewers were older," Alden said.

"We like to appeal to all age groups. As characters age, so does the audience. Without young characters entering the scene, you may lose the younger audience," she said.

"Many (viewers) don't have families of their own, and they may get a sense of family which they can identify with from watching the show. It can be a very moving sort of thing," Alden said.

Hospitals implement new system to reduce rising health care costs

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Patients, doctors, hospitals and insurers have been riding a giant health-care system merry-go-round that has been spinning costs skyward for decades.

In a story on medical costs in Sunday's editions, the Wichita Eagle-Beacon reported that until now the insurance system — private and government — has done the most to keep it spinning, by raising rates and taxes.

People haven't had to worry about money because insurance paid doctors and hospitals. Hospital officials had little reason to hold down their charges because they knew the insurance company would pay up. The doctors set their fees with the same assurance and were able to count on the hospital to give them all the equipment and space they needed, the story said.

Last year — when that system cost $362 billion, up from $321 billion in 1982 — it was the first time health costs accounted for more than one-tenth of the gross national product.

Closer to home, latest figures show Kansans spent nearly $2.6 billion on their health in 1981 — almost 9 percent of the gross state product. On the average, $1,014 was spent on health for every man, woman and child in the state, compared with $1,090 nationally.

A new system is being implemented to reduce cost increases, but no one has come up with a way to actually lower the costs.

The new system of paying bills is setting the health care system on its head. Instead of paying doctors and hospitals whatever they charge, Medicare and Blue Cross for the first time have set binding limits on what they will pay hospitals.

"We've lost control of the costs, and that could break the system," said Harry Steinmeyer, former executive director for the southeast Kansas health planning agency. "It could fall apart. And no change will come until we change the reimbursement system."

The rush to change the bill-paying system is being led by the federal government as it tries to prevent the collapse of Medicare.

Close behind are private insurers who are losing customers — and money — because individuals and employers have begun to resist their continually rising premium costs.

In Kansas, the change has been more abrupt than almost anywhere else. On Jan. 1, Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas, the state's biggest private insurer, adopted a system much like Medicare's. Blue Cross and Medicare account for 80 percent of the hospital admissions in the state.

The Medicare changes, which took effect Oct. 1, sped through Congress last spring on the heels of predictions that the Medicare fund would go broke by 1987.

Medicare spending has increased by nearly 30 percent in the past two years, to more than $56 billion last year. More than $32 billion went to hospitals, so the brakes were put on hospital charges.

But while the overhaul in reimbursement may save almost $10 billion this year, federal budget analysts say that only buys time. The bankruptcy of Medicare, they say, has been stalled off by no more than three years.

U.S. State Department wants upkeep funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The State Department building, nerve center of the nation's far-flung diplomacy, is having serious maintenance problems. Clocks don't work, elevators and escalators break down and the spacious inner courtyard is littered with mounds of dirt and debris.

It was decided last week to remove all the building's 1,400 clocks, which haven't had the correct time in months, and install battery-operated ones. Also on tap:

—Finishing repairs in the main courtyard, which has been torn up for months to fix a leak in the underground garage.

—Fixing the leak in the garage. Sewage from rest rooms and rain spouts drips onto cars.

—Keeping the building's main escalator working. After not working for two months, the up escalator was fixed Friday.

—Finishing work on the new incinerator so secretaries need not move bags of classified refuse to the garage to be trucked elsewhere.

Employees also would like cleaner floors and bathrooms, hallway walls painted, working air-conditioning and broken ceiling and floor tiles replaced. Graffiti mars walls in some of the 118 bathrooms.

One person responsible for maintenance, John Condayan, deputy assistant secretary of state for operations who has been on the job only a few weeks, said, "I'm not pleased with the appearance of the building. I want people to take pride in the building they are working in. If they see sloppy conditions, if they see paper and trash on the floor or if the sinks are stopped up, they will not have any incentive to do their part to keep things clean."

Embassy attacks cause tighter security

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The U.S. Embassy in Stockholm is using boulders. In London, 3-foot concrete shrubbery tubs are in place. And in Rome, a steel barrier will rise at the push of a button to block the main gate.

American embassies in many world capitals are putting up obstacles to discourage terrorist attacks like the one last April when a truck carrying dynamite slammed into the American Embassy in Beirut. Sixty-three people, including 17 Americans, died in the blast.

None of the barriers looks quite like the ugly cement-filled oil drums that served as bomb shields at the embassy in Saigon, but the days when anyone could walk into an American Embassy almost as easily as into a supermarket are past.

"Lots of our embassies around the world were built at a time when you didn't have walking or driving bombers all over the place. They've got to be upgraded in today's world," said an official at the U.S. Embassy on tree-lined Dag Hammarskjöld Boulevard in Copenhagen.

The Danish police have lent cement-bottomed barricades to the American Embassy for temporary use while a permanent blockade is designed.

Most embassies are in highest-traffic districts, so crude anti-tank barriers are out. The American Embassy in London, which occupies one section of elegant Grosvenor Square, has put 12 big shrubbery tubs in two staggered rows in front of the main entrance, and more tubs block side entrances.

Some American embassies have resorted to sand-filled dump trucks like those that ringed the White House in Washington late last year before permanent barriers were installed.

Though the Mideast attacks, including a bombing at the U.S. Embassy in Kuwait Dec. 12 that killed two people, have been blamed on pro-Iranian elements that oppose U.S. policy in the region, tightened security also appears necessary for other reasons.

In West Germany, where there have been widespread protests against the deployment of U.S. intermediate-range nuclear missiles, security at many American installations also has been increased. There are more armed guards, and trucks loaded with sand and sand-filled barrels partially block entrance roads to slow speeding vehicles.

Access to many embassies was tightened noticeably after Islamic revolutionaries took over the U.S. Embassy in Iran in 1979 and held 52 Americans hostage for 444 days.

Though it was acknowledged that the small contingents of Marine guards assigned to embassies would have little chance of blocking a large mob of people, bullet-proof glass and metal-detectors were installed in public areas in many embassies.

In December, boulders were placed in a row on the lawns of the American Embassy in Stockholm to prevent vehicles from crashing into the building. The boulders were intended "for rock and flower garden improvement of the environment," an official said.

Conservative leads Ecuador presidential race

By The Associated Press

QUITO, Ecuador — A Conservative and a Social Democrat took commanding leads in general elections Sunday and appeared headed for a presidential runoff. Seven other candidates trailed far behind.

With 3 percent of the vote counted, Leon Febres-Cordero, the Conservative Party's presidential candidate, led the field with 39 percent. Rodrigo Borgia, a Social Democrat, was second with 23 percent, unofficial returns from the National Press Center showed.

Centrist Angel Duarte was the only other candidate even close, with 14.5 percent of the vote.

If no candidate wins a majority, the top two finishers face a runoff May 6 to replace President Osvaldo Hurtado, who was not in the race.

More than 20,000 soldiers, some with fixed bayonets, guarded the 12,500 polling places.

Voting was generally peaceful but police said they arrested 11 people who attacked a polling place in Babahoyo, 125 miles southwest of Quito in the Guayaquil area. In Portoviejo, about 150 miles southwest of Quito, police said six people were charged with disturbing the peace for destroying ballots and voting lists.

The national election board denied a radio report that one person was killed during the voting. Two people were slain in pre-election violence during the long campaign that began Oct. 31 in this South American country of about 9 million people.

Besides the presidential race, the estimated 3.7 million voters also cast ballots for a new vice president, a 71-member unicameral Congress and 500 city and county offices from a list of more than 5,000 candidates from 17 political parties.

"The Decline of Western Civilization is a shrewd and engrossing documentary even for audiences who have absolutely no patience for the music it includes."

Director Penelope Spheeris uses the Los Angeles punk music scene circa 1980 as her focus for this amazing documentary, and the film's compelling format balances outstanding concert performances with enlightening (and often hysterically funny) interviews with band members, managers, club owners, writers and hardcore fans. Technically stunning, THE DECLINE... has a remarkably lucid approach to its uncompromising subject matter. The disturbing footage is critical as well as sympathetic, and the skill and wit with which the illuminating material was assembled cannot be ignored.

K-State still winless in conference play

'Hawks crush 'Cats for 65-54 victory

By TIM FILBY
Staff Writer

The University of Kansas Jayhawks ended almost three years of frustration Saturday by pounding the struggling K-State Wildcats, 65-54, in a regionally televised basketball game at Allen Field House in Lawrence.

March 1981 was the last time the 'Hawks had beaten their archrival from Manhattan — absorbing five straight losses along the way. But from the start, it was clear K-State's streak was in deep trouble.

The contest was an illustration of two teams going in different directions. The Jayhawks, on top of the Big Eight Conference with a 4-1 conference record, came out playing with confidence in front of over 15,000 screaming home fans while the 'Cats, buried in the conference cellar with an 0-4 mark, were tentative throughout the game.

K-State could snare only 26 rebounds compared to KU's 39 caroms. The Jayhawks' active 2-3 zone defense also harassed the 'Cats into 36 percent shooting from the field while on the offensive end the 'Hawks shot 49 percent. The only aspect of the game the Jayhawks didn't control was their tempers as they gathered three technical fouls.

Technical fouls were whistled against KU Coach Larry Brown, 7-foot-1 center Greg Dreiling and forward Brian Martin.

"They (Kansas) played well — they're a fine team," K-State Head Coach Jack Hartman said. "Let's give them credit. We just didn't compete hard enough."

The 'Cats found themselves down 6-0 before getting off their first shot. Two K-State turnovers combined with two baskets by Dreiling inside and a shot by forward Carl Henry, who led all scorers with 23 points, put the 'Cats down early. It wasn't until the 16:30 mark of the opening half that a jumper by Lafayette Watkins put K-State on the scoreboard for the first time.

Brown's technical resulted in two free throws by guard Jim Roder, cutting the lead to 6-4. After a bucket by Jayhawk forward Kelly Knight, Roder completed a three-point play on a driving layup and a free throw to narrow the 'Hawks lead to one. Roder's bucket was the last points K-State would ring up for nearly eight minutes.

The Jayhawks scored 13 unanswered points to take a 21-7 lead before guard Jonas Cody connected for K-State on a follow shot off his own miss with 6:52 remaining.

The 'Cats fought back to make the halftime score respectable, outscoring the Jayhawks 13-8 in the final six minutes.

Cody and forward Tom Alfaro keyed the K-State comeback, Cody scoring five points and Alfaro hitting two long jumpers.

Kansas worked for the last shot with 1:52 remaining, with Martin hitting the bucket with two seconds left to give the 'Hawks a 29-20 intermission edge.

The 'Cats had shot as low as 17 percent for most of the first half before improving to 35 percent by the end of the half.

A technical foul on Dreiling in the first minute started the second half on the wrong foot for the Jayhawks. Roder hit the two free throws to slice KU's margin to seven, 29-22. From then on, however, the 'Hawks began building on their lead. Fourteen second-half points by Henry helped propel the 'Hawks to post margins as large as 21 points in the final minutes.

The only excitement of the second half was a slam dunk by KU's Knight off a lob pass by diminutive freshman guard Mark Turgeon, and Dreiling bringing the ball upcourt against the K-State press in the final moments. The only thing left up for grabs was KU's margin of victory.

Only two 'Cats scored in double figures, with Cody and forward Eddie Elder hitting 12 points each since K-State's frontline was dominated by the bigger Jayhawks. Five different 'Cats players failed to get the inside game going. They could manage only 28 total points and 19 rebounds while KU's frontline combination of Henry, Knight, Dreiling and Martin totaled 51 points and 29 boards.

"They (the Jayhawks) have a pretty good frontline," Elder said. "I think they hurt us most on the rebounds. I thought they played good. They executed pretty well. They just outplayed us."

Hartman said a lack of aggressiveness was his team's main problem.

"We didn't start playing until we dug ourselves a hole we couldn't get out of," he said. "We passed well, but we just didn't stop to take any shots. We didn't penetrate, and we weren't aggressive."

Roder echoed Hartman's observation of the 'Cats, whose overall record is now 8-9.

"We were just passing the ball on perimeter — we weren't being aggressive," he said. "By the time we did start being aggressive, we were down by 19 points."

Elder said that a good KU defense and poor shooting by the 'Cats contributed to K-State's anemic offensive performance.

"They were applying pressure on the wing," he said. "But if they do that, other things should open up. We don't see the floor sometimes as well as we should."

"We need to just play basketball," Elder said. "I'm disappointed to open the conference like this. I think our attitude is good before games, but when we get out there, we just have a problem playing well."

The loss may have put the 'Cats' backs against the wall, but guard Eric Watson said this may be good for the team.

"Maybe some good will come out of this — maybe it'll make us more hungry."

The 'Cats may find out just how hungry they are to get their first conference win when they host both the Iowa State University Cyclones at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday and the University of Nebraska Cornhuskers at 4:10 p.m. Saturday.

Adkins cans 29 as Kansas upsets Lady 'Cats

Staff/Jeff Taylor

Sheronda Jenkins finds it difficult to get a pass off as KU applies its pressure defense. The No. 9-ranked Lady 'Cats went down to defeat at the hands of KU's Lady Jayhawks Saturday at Allen Field House in Lawrence.

By VIKKI WATSON
Assistant Sports Editor

A season-low 32 percent from the field, missed inside shots, a dismal 59 percent at the free-throw line and Vickie Adkins' 29 points.

What it all added up to be was a day of goods and bads — a bad day for the Lady 'Cats basketball team and a good day for the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks as they slapped a 71-58 defeat upon the No. 7-ranked Lady 'Cats Saturday at Allen Field House in Lawrence.

Kansas' victory can be attributed to the performance of 6-foot-1 sophomore Vickie Adkins, who picked apart the K-State defense for a career-high 29 points. Adkins had scored 25 on Jan. 25 in the Lady 'Hawks 98-89 victory over the University of Nebraska.

"We could not stop Adkins," said Lady 'Cats Head Coach Lynn Hickey. "There was no fancy offense. She (Adkins) just went down and posted up. Our post defense was poor."

And while the K-State defense had its hands full with Adkins, the Lady 'Cats offense also had its troubles against a KU man-to-man defense which prevented K-State from gaining a lead throughout the contest.

Angie Snider, a 5-foot-10 senior who leads the Big Eight Conference in scoring with a 24.5 point average, got the Lady 'Hawks rolling with a 12-foot bank shot. K-State would stay close in the game's opening moments with the play of sophomore Sheronda Jenkins and senior Angie Bonner, who accounted for the Lady 'Cats' first eight points.

KU outscored the Lady 'Cats 19-8 in the next nine minutes to take its biggest lead of the first half, 27-16. Adkins scored 16 of those 19 points on easy inside jumpers and layups.

K-State fought back with a scoring run of its own, aided by a pressing fullcourt defense that caused several KU turnovers and two charging calls. An inside shot by Bonner off a missed shot by freshman Carlisa Thomas brought the Lady 'Cats to within three points, 27-24, before KU closed out the half with a 36-29 lead.

Adkins hit eight of 12 field goals and three of four free throws for 19 first-half points. Kansas made 47 percent of its field goals and 66 percent of its free throws, while K-State connected on 59 percent of its field goals but could hit only 37.5 percent of its free throws.

With the help of sophomore Jennifer Jones, who scored following an offensive rebound and later added a free throw, the Lady 'Cats pulled within four, 36-32, at the outset of the second half. However, KU upped its lead to 42-34 on two easy layups off a K-State press and a 20-foot jumper by junior Mary Myers.

It was a case of missed opportunities as the 'Cats began another charge that would bring them to as close as two, 43-41, but K-State failed to connect on several inside shots.

The Lady 'Cats would continue to stay close to the 'Hawks, utilizing two Bonner free throws to cut the gap to 52-51 with 9:01 minutes remaining in the contest, but four points by Snider and a free throw by Adkins increased the KU margin to 57-51.

Women

A turn-around inside jumper by Jennifer Jones brought the 'Lady Cats' within four, 57-53, but that would be as close as they could get as two consecutive technicals — one on junior Tina Dixon and the other on Jenkins — and an inside bucket by Adkins squelched the last K-State scoring run. KU broke the Lady 'Cats' press for easy layups and finished out the scoring for the 71-58 victory.

The win improves the 'Hawks' overall record to 7-9 and its Big Eight Conference standing to 3-1. K-State falls to 13-4 and also stands 3-1 in Big Eight play.

The loss throws the Lady 'Cats' in a three-way tie for first place in the conference, with Missouri also holding on to a 3-1 record following a Jan. 27 loss to the University of Oklahoma.

"We just really blew our chance," Hickey said of the 'Cats' opportunity to take sole possession of first place in the Big Eight. "But that's going to happen in the Big Eight."

"KU was very well prepared, (and) I thought they did an excellent job. The kids let the officiating and the crowd get to them, but once again, the credit goes to KU."

Sophomore Cassandra Jones continued her double-figure scoring of recent games, connecting on five of 13 field goals and six of 12 free throws to lead K-State with 16 points. Bonner scored 15 and Jenkins added 12 to the Lady 'Cats' cause. Jennifer Jones and Bonner lead K-State in the rebounding department, each grabbing nine caroms.

K-State next faces Iowa State University at Ahearn Field House at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday.

East captures all-star victory

By The Associated Press

DENVER — Andrew Toney scored nine points and Julius Erving tossed in six of his game-high 34 points in overtime Sunday, lifting the East to a 154-145 victory over the West in the 34th annual National Basketball Association All-Star Game.

The East, winning for a record fifth straight time, rallied from a 14-point halftime deficit and was seemingly in command with a 128-119 lead with 3:50 to go in regulation.

But Jack Sikma of Seattle triggered a dramatic West rally, climaxed by Earvin "Magic" Johnson's basket that tied it 132-132 with 20 seconds remaining.

The East's Larry Bird missed a jumper from the corner with about six seconds left. The West got the rebound, but a desperation jumper off the buzzer by Johnson caromed off the backboard.

Isiah Thomas of the Detroit Pistons put the East ahead for good with a three-point play to open the overtime and was named the game's Most Valuable Player. The guard finished with 21 points and 15 assists.

Johnson, who held the game's old assist record with 16 last year, finished with 22 assists.

Kareem Abdul-Jabbar of Los Angeles, making his record-tying 13th All-Star appearance, finished with 25 points to lead the West.

It was the third overtime game in NBA All-Star history, each won by the East, and the second in four years. The 154 points was an All-Star record, as was the combined 299 points.

Johnson, of Los Angeles, and Sikma finished with 15 points apiece while Kiki Vandeweghe of Denver added 14 for the West.

Bernard King of New York, who helped key the East's second-half rally, wound up with 18 points.

With Johnson dishing out 13 assists, the West broke on top 76-62 in the first half, despite 17 points by Philadelphia star Erving.

The East, spearheaded by King, closed within three points midway through the third quarter, but the West went into the fourth period with a 107-99 advantage which quickly vanished as Bill Laimbeer, a 6-foot-11, 245-pounder from the Detroit Pistons, took charge.

The East outscored the West 14-4 early in the fourth period to forge a 113-113 deadlock by 7:50 to go.

Laimbeer, scoreless during the first three quarters, scored six of his 13 points, and his Pistons' teammate, Thomas, had four points and an assist. Laimbeer's three-point play put the East ahead 122-117 with 5:54 remaining. Twenty seconds later, the big Detroit center, who was named to the All-Star team as a substitute for the injured Moses Malone of Philadelphia, hit a follow shot for a 124-119 lead.

Theismann leads NFC to 45-3 win

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU, Hawaii — Joe Theismann, coming off a frustrating game in the Super Bowl, staged a Pro Bowl record passing show Sunday as the National Football Conference rolled to a 45-3 victory over the American Conference.

The 34-year-old Theismann, making his second Pro Bowl start in as many years, topped the 17 completions record set by San Diego Chargers' Dan Fouts last year and the passing mark of two touchdowns that had been shared by three players.

The Washington Redskins quarterback, playing just over half the game, completed 21 of 27 passes for 247 yards and three touchdowns.

He threw scoring strikes of 16 yards to Williams Andrews of Atlanta, 8 yards to James Lofton of Green Bay and 6 to the Packers' Paul Coffman.

Theismann, a victim of six sacks and two interceptions in the Redskins' 38-9 Super Bowl loss to the Los Angeles Raiders a week ago, opened the Pro Bowl by competing his first 11 throws.

The NFC broke on top on Haji-Sheikh's field goal, then built a 17-3 halftime lead as Andrews hauled in touchdown passes from Theismann and San Francisco's Joe Montana.

The NFC defense, meanwhile, held the AFC stars in check. Among the standouts for the National Conference, which recorded eight sacks of AFC quarterbacks Fouts and Bill Kenney, was Los Angeles Rams' safety Nolan Cromwell.

He picked off one of Fouts' pass and scampered 45 yards for an NFC score and later recovered an AFC fumble.

The NFC, which now has won six of the last 11 and holds a 9-5 overall edge in the series, got its other points on a 14-yard touchdown run by Los Angeles Rams' rookie Eric Dickerson.

Cromwell's pass interception return in the third quarter made it 24-3, then Theismann's final two touchdown throws and Dickerson's late run wrapped up the scoring.

The AFC's only score was a 43-yard field goal by Pittsburgh's Gary Anderson in the second quarter.

Kansas City's Kenney, added to the AFC squad when an injury kept Miami's Dan Marino out of the game, completed just seven of 32 passes for 80 yards and was intercepted twice.

Kings stop Gretzky; scoring streak ends

By The Associated Press

EDMONTON, Alberta — Wayne Gretzky, bothered by a bruised left shoulder, considered sitting out Saturday night's game against the Los Angeles Kings.

But the magnificent Edmonton Oilers' center also was nursing a National Hockey League record 51-game consecutive point-scoring streak, and so he decided to play.

The Kings rose to the occasion, ending the amazing streak, which dated to the opening game of the season, and won the game 4-2.

"I pondered the last couple of nights about not playing. But I felt if I was going to be stopped, I wanted to be stopped playing, not sitting in the stands," Gretzky said. "But the shoulder is no excuse — they (the Kings) played well, they deserved to win, they deserved to stop the streak."

Gretzky said he would rest Sunday and Monday before deciding whether to play in the NHL All-Star Game Tuesday night at East Rutherford, N.J.

He collected 61 goals and 153 points during the streak. He now has 28 regular-season games left in which to go after his single-season scoring record of 212 points, set in 1980-81.

Kings interim coach Rogatien Vachon said he was so happy his team had beaten Edmonton, he wasn't even thinking about the end of the streak.

But, if he forgot the streak, no one else in the crowd did. They sat through the final moments, urging Gretzky on. When the final buzzer sounded, they rose in unison and gave him a standing ovation.

"I'm disappointed it's over, sorry it didn't go a little longer," Gretzky said. "But I'm glad it ended at home. It started here, and it finished here."

It ended because the Kings, which halted Gretzky's streak at a record 30 games last season, came up with a superb checking effort that stifled the NHL's most powerful offense.

After goalies Markus Mattsson of Los Angeles and Andy Moog of Edmonton forged a scoreless first period, the Kings built a 3-0 lead in the second stanza on two goals by Bernie Nicholls and one by Anders Hakansson.

Don Jackson and Tom Gorence sandwiched Edmonton goals around one by Ken Houston of the Kings in the third period, but by then the outcome of the game didn't really matter. All attention was focused on Gretzky and the streak.

The Kings, particularly defenseman Jay Wells and Mark Hardy, who were on the ice every time Gretzky was, limited the movements and the scoring chances of the Oilers' great center.

"The defensemen did an excellent job," Mattsson said. "And so did the forwards. I don't think he had a shot in the third period."

Gretzky had only three shots on goal in the game.

"I'm glad I at least had a couple of good chances," he said. "I would hate to have been stopped and not be in the game."

U.S. to weigh trade-offs of nuclear talks

Nation awaits Soviets' reply

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.S. negotiator Edward Rowny said Monday the United States would consider any serious Soviet proposals, including curbs on new U.S. nuclear missiles in Europe, in an effort to work out a strategic arms control agreement.

After a half-hour meeting with President Reagan, Rowny told reporters he has a number of U.S. approaches or "trade-offs" to present if the Soviets agree to resume discussions in Geneva, Switzerland. "It's in their interest to come back," Rowny said. "We are now in a position, when we return to the table, to make a breakthrough."

Negotiations to curb medium-range missiles in Europe and separate talks on controlling intercontinental nuclear weapons are stalemated. The Soviets disrupted both discussions to protest the installation of U.S. Pershing II missiles in West Germany and cruise missiles in Britain.

"We have some concrete proposals on trade-offs," Rowny said.

Rowny was unwilling to predict whether the Soviets would agree to fix a date for another round of the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks.

"There are all kinds of signals coming out," said Rowny, who heads the U.S. delegation to the START talks.

Rowny said Reagan agreed that a settlement might be based on trimming the U.S. lead in some weapons if the Soviets gave ground on others.

For instance, the U.S. negotiator said, "we believe our advantages in bombers and cruise missiles can be traded off for their advantages in ballistic missiles."

In the past, the United States has resisted Soviet efforts to include European-based missiles in the START discussions. But Rowny said that "if the Soviets say they want to talk and they begin bringing up other issues, we're going to listen to any proposal they have."

The White House meeting followed Reagan's announcement Sunday night he was seeking re-election. Rowny denied there was a political motive in the timing of Reagan's focus on arms-reduction talks.

Also Monday, the State Department denounced as "baseless" Soviet charges that the United States has violated existing arms control agreements through such actions as deploying the new missiles in Europe.

President Reagan last week sent Congress a report alleging Soviet "violations and probable violations." Alan Romberg, the State Department's deputy spokesman, expressed U.S. regret that Moscow chose to respond to American concerns on treaty compliance "by dusting off a familiar list of spurious countercharges."

In another development, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said U.S. nuclear tests will be announced only when they are considered "significant."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy turns as he moves through a crowd of well-wishers and students who greeted him after emerging from McCain Auditorium following his Landon Lecture.

Kennedy chastises Reagan during 61st Landon Lecture

By LEE WHITE
Manhattan Editor

A packed house waited an extra 35 minutes Monday morning in McCain Auditorium for Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., to arrive and begin the 61st Landon Lecture. The veteran politician's plane had been delayed by head winds.

After Kennedy took the stage to a standing ovation, the crowd heard him apologize for the delay and blast President Reagan's economic and foreign policies.

"In 1980, we were told that a supply-side tax cut would generate new savings and new revenue, and that by the end of 1983, we would have a balanced budget," Kennedy said. "Today, the savings rate has dropped and we have the highest federal deficit in history. Measured by that standard, supply-side economics should have been left on the back of the cocktail napkin on which the Laffer Curve was originally written in a Washington restaurant 10 years ago."

Kennedy chastised Reagan for making election year politics part of his policy. Reagan's advisers "wink and hint that of course they will bring him around — in 1985," he said.

"A responsible economic policy is also the key to putting profit back in agriculture," Kennedy said. "The embattled farmers of Massachusetts fired the shot at Concord Bridge in 1775 that started the American Revolution, and the embittered farmers of the Middle West will cast the votes in 1984 that defeat the Reagan revolution."

"Where is the economic recovery for those who are sleeping in the snow and cold of our streets, for the black teenagers who are out of school and out of work? And who will never have the opportunity that most of you enjoy?"

The president's foreign policy also was a Kennedy target. He repeatedly drew parallels between the Vietnam War and conflicts in Lebanon and Central America.

"We must not talk peace in 1984 as a prelude to making war in 1985," Kennedy said.

To quell fears created by an administration that talks of win-able nuclear war, Kennedy said, the president says he favors arms control.

"But what faith can voters have that the president will pursue this professed interest in his second term when he has been so bellicose in his first?" Kennedy asked.

He called for the immediate withdrawal of the Marines from Lebanon. He also called for talks with the Soviets to effect a freeze on the production, testing and deployment of nuclear arms.

"In 1984, we must also demand that America's role in Central America be stated, debated and resolved," Kennedy said. "I oppose the covert war in Nicaragua and the military escalation in El Salvador."

"Central America must be an issue in this campaign so that afterward, we will not go to war by the back door, with our people divided and deceived. History has taught us in anguish and retreat the folly of that course."

After the speech, Kennedy ducked questions about his political Marine, civilians die in daylong series of clashes in Beirut

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — U.S. Marines battled Shiite Muslim militiamen Monday with tank cannon, mortar and machine-gun fire in a daylong series of clashes that killed one Marine, U.S. fire reportedly killed a 9-year-old girl and two other civilians.

Three Marines and two schoolchildren were among 29 reported wounded during the three battles that broke out at 9:10 a.m. and lasted past nightfall.

The Marine spokesman, Maj. Dennis Brooks, said one of two Marines wounded in an afternoon clash died while waiting to be evacuated. The other was flown by helicopter to the amphibious assault ship Guam off the Beirut coast.

Two Marines suffered slight injuries in mid-morning clashes with the militia. They were treated and returned to duty, Brooks said.

The Marine who died was the 259th American serviceman to die in combat in Lebanon since the Marines were sent to Beirut in September 1982. Brooks withheld his name until his family is notified.

Brooks said that in each of the clashes, the Marines fired only after they were attacked.

"We have no way of knowing what we hit, and what casualties there were," Brooks said. "We are sorry about any civilian casualties, but the bottom line is that we are taking fire from the area and we have to defend ourselves."

Spokesmen for Amal, the main Shiite militia group, and hospitals in southern Beirut said that Marine fire killed three civilians, including the girl, and wounded 22 people, including two schoolchildren and one militiaman.

In the Shiite neighborhood of Hay el-Sellum, Amal fighters showed AP reporters a blue-green school bus with four large-caliber bullet holes in one side and fresh blood on two of the 12 seats. The bus was carrying children from the Shiite Ahlieh School in nearby Bourj el-Barajneh when it was hit, the Amal militia said.

Lebanon state radio said one of the two Marines injured in the afternoon clash had been shot in the chest. Brooks refused to provide details or name any of the injured Marines.

House approves benefits for Agent Orange victims

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Military veterans suffering from certain diseases presumably related to exposure to the herbicide Agent Orange during Vietnam service or radiation from open-air atomic tests would be eligible for temporary compensation under a bill given House passage Monday.

The measure, approved by voice vote without dissent and sent to the Senate, is intended as a stopgap until the federal Centers for Disease Control completes a full study, expected in 1987 or 1988, on the possible links between Agent Orange and later health problems.

The Congressional Budget Office estimated the bill's cost at $4.7 million in the current fiscal year, increasing gradually to $5.4 million in fiscal 1988.

Council approves fee for failed traffic appeals

By KATHY BARTELLI
Staff Writer

The approval of a parking fee increase made last week was rescinded and a $1 processing fee for failed appeals was approved at the Jan. 30 meeting of the Traffic and Parking Council.

The $1 fee, which is intended to prevent the appeals system from being used to delay ticket payment, was originally set at $5.

The fee was reduced after Mark Galyardt, junior in industrial engineering, told the council that Wichita State University was able to cut appeals in half by implementing a processing charge of just $1. Wichita State averages the same number of tickets per year as K-State, Galyardt said.

The $1 fee will be used for postal expenses in mailing the results of appeals. The mailing will now be done from the K-State Police Department rather than the Student Governing Association. This action is expected to save SGA about $320 in postage per year.

Approval of the parking fee increase was rescinded after council members objected to not having enough information to make a decision at the time the motion was approved.

Stuart Swartz, professor of civil engineering, said no factual information was given at the last meeting.

"There was no data given on the amount of money generated at present, no data given on the anticipated revenue if the amount was increased, and there was no data given on operational expenses. The only data given was an increase in costs," Swartz said.

Charles Long, chairman of the council and associate professor of extension horticulture, said there was not time for the council to see all the information and they would have to take it on "good faith" that the money was needed.

Members of the council refused to make the decision without proper documentation and rescinded approval of the increase. A subcommittee will be formed to study the proposal more closely.

In other action, illegal parking in designated reserved stalls was made a group III violation, which is punishable by a $25 fine.

The approved recommendations will be sent to Gene Cross, vice president of university facilities, who will send them to the Board of Regents. The proposals will go into effect in fall 1984 if approved by the regents.

Planetarium offers new program

Deaf learn with computer assistance

By DIONA NACE
Collegian Reporter

For the deaf, a visit to a planetarium can be a confusing experience. When the lights go out and the dome-shaped room is filled with darkness, a deaf person loses touch with his main sense for receiving communication — his sight.

Ted Stalec, director of the planetarium in Cardwell Hall, has developed a series of programs to deal with the special needs and limitations of the hearing impaired. Eventually the series will contain three programs, but currently only one has been completed, he said.

To replace lip reading and sign language for the deaf, and loud talking for the hearing impaired, Stalec has added a computer, keyboards and a television screen to the planetarium so that communication can be two-way. The computer program has been developed so that questions can be asked at any time.

The introductory presentation lasts about 10 to 15 minutes, depending on the number of questions asked. It is brief because a deaf person's main survival sense is sight, and if he is unable to use it for an extended period, he can become confused watching the screen and the planetarium workings for the first time, Stalec said.

The presentation is also brief because it is designed as an introduction to astronomy, and its purpose is to arouse viewers' curiosity and familiarize them with a new vocabulary, Stalec said.

The two other presentations that will complete the series will be 25-30 minutes long. One will be about constellations, the other about planets. The planetarium itself has 37 programs, so eventually all of the programs could be made available to those with a hearing problems.

Peggy Nelson, instructor in speech pathology and audiology, was asked by Stalec to critique the presentation.

"He has done a good job of allowing time for looking for questions and answers and devising a method for getting their attention," she said.

Nelson suggested variable reading speeds to allow for the different age groups and reading levels among audiences. Stalec wrote the program for three different reading levels — elementary, junior high and college.

Stalec said he would like to promote the introductory program and make it available to other planetariums at only the cost of reproducing the program. In this way, he said, the benefits can be spread, and he can receive suggestions for continuing improvements for the program.

By disseminating the program to other planetariums, Stalec said he hopes to receive a research grant for his time and for equipment to produce the rest of the series. The computer he currently uses is borrowed from the Department of Physics.

Stalec said he perceived the idea of using a computer to overcome the limitations of the deaf by using something similar to what television stations do with closed captions. The difference is that his product implements a screen that flashes stars across it to get the attention of the audience.

Despite the limited number of showings Stalec has conducted, the response has been very positive, he said, adding that up until now, a planetarium had little to offer the deaf.

Correction

In an article in the Jan. 27 Collegian, "Candidates declare bids for campus elections," it was mistakenly stated that student body presidential candidate Ken Heinz is a sophomore in computer science. It should have stated that Heinz is a junior in computer science and accounting.

Soviet

He said the criteria were the importance of the test and the effect on the area surrounding the Nevada test site near Las Vegas.

A White House official, who spoke only on condition that he not be identified, said the decision was based on "growing concern over site security, heightened by partially successful attempts by anti-nuclear groups to penetrate the test site."

Soviet-American agreements permit only underground nuclear tests and limit them to 150 kilotons. For several years, U.S. tests were disclosed to the public.

Until now, the Reagan administration has refrained from making new proposals aimed at wooing the Soviets back to Geneva. But, in a statement, Rowney said Reagan agreed that "we are now in a position, when we return to the table..."

Critics of the U.S. strategy of keeping the European missile talks separate from those on intercontinental weapons say that merging the two sets of negotiations and putting all issues on the table at once could improve prospects for a trade-off.

Three arms control experts, two Americans and one West German, said at a news conference Monday the medium-range and strategic arms talks should have been merged in the first place.

Paul Warnke, chief U.S. negotiator of the SALT II treaty, said the medium-range talks "were always on the respirator and once the NATO deployment began, the plug was pulled."

Karsten Voight, foreign affairs spokesman for the opposition Social Democrats in West Germany, said any resumption of the START negotiations without medium-range missile talks "would be perceived in Europe as the U.S. being more worried about weapons that could hit the U.S. than about weapons that could hit Europe."

future. Earlier, he said he and former Gov. Alfred M. Landon, in whose honor the lecture series is presented, had something in common: both ran for president and both lost.

"I'm planning on a Democrat winning in '84 and supporting him in '88," Kennedy said.

Unlike past lectures, no protests or disturbances were reported. The crowd lining Kennedy's entrance to McCain seemed more interested in meeting the senior senator than protesting.

Kennedy left campus about 1:30 p.m. after lunch with the Landon Patrons. He also was to have met with Gov. John Carlin.

Carlin and his wife, Karen, attended the speech as did Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan., whom Kennedy thanked for inviting him to K-State.
